

FIRST BASE

Just recently I had the opportunity to share some of this material with an old mate of mine, someone very smart and extremely well educated, but who was largely out of contact for a time. They were not crossing the pacific on a solo yacht, but that sort of situation would broadly fit the limitations associated. In any case there really wasn't much opportunity to sit down and chat directly in the immediate short term. So instead of that I simply shared the entire bundle, the larger books included, thinking that this might make up for the lack of dialogue. They could then download all of that and listen/read at their own leisure.

I already knew this might be a mistake, but it was an interesting experiment. We have been gradually creeping up on the possibility that direct conversation will no longer be necessary in this sense, so I figured this might be a good opportunity to see how close we had come in that regard.

Anyway, it didn't go well. Actually, I now think that adding more information without first of all establishing the basic framework might be a big mistake, due to the way a wrong turn taken early on can become compounded rather than corrected in that instance, leading to even more dramatic misunderstanding. And in this case my friend ended up flying way off course, eventually giving up in confusion and frustration, all of which he summed up in a message that showed just how far he had wandered. A bit of a mess to be sure.

Essentially, several important things had been mistakenly conflated at some point along the way, as well as the main thrust of the whole thing not quite being grasped, all with predictably bad results.

First of all his conclusion was that it really wasn't much different to several other ideas that have been 'floating around in the intellectual mists for thousands of years', as he said. He is a student of 'mindfulness' in one of its various forms, amongst other things, so that is the lens through which he was viewing it all. Secondly, then, he also vaguely implied that there are other 'demonstrably effective interventions' that already do basically the same thing being proposed.

Neither of which would have been a problem if they were true, and I certainly don't mind a good bit of rigorous rational pushback, but in this case neither of those claims actually are true, and it was also very clear where the misunderstandings had arisen. I kept indicating that we really would need to chat about all of this in order to reach any point of clarity, whilst at the same time indicating the possibility of the very dramatic shift in state outlines in the emerging paradigm, and somehow these two things had become intertwined in his mind.

So whilst I wouldn't normally bother too much, given how common such misunderstandings are in this instance, in this case I took the time to explain, given that this was someone I respect a lot. Eventually he grasped what I was pointing out, and we had a bit of a laugh - also finally understanding what I meant when I said we probably needed to chat at some point instead, and how much simpler that would be.

Overall the whole thing once again confirmed just how easy all of this stuff is to get totally wrong, especially at first. I therefore thought I might at least share the guts of my response, if only because it might be somewhat instructive to others who could potentially find themselves falling into the same holes. It really isn't anyone's fault, but really just the nature of the event itself, and how far outside the boundaries of expectation it happens to land. Really, nobody ever gets it at first.

Anyway here is the guts of what I said in response, bearing in mind that we enjoy a very robust conversational style. We are both quite accustomed to a rather rigorous and gladiatorial form of rational dialogue, a type of intellectual combat that some might find somewhat confronting, but which is all quite normal at this level.

•

I must apologise. Somehow you are maintaining a deep confusion regarding what I have been saying, and I'm not really sure how to get out of the hole this particular situation creates. But this is all my fault, as we will see below.

You are asking me to provide details for something I never indicated as a possibility - that somehow I am going to stimulate the transition 2EQ points to as a possibility within the confines of a conversation with me? That really would be a critical misunderstanding of what was being pointed out in everything I offered. And this is not any criticism of you by the way, apparently that is simply how shit I am as a writer.

However, I think you will find that this was something I explained right at the outset here. One of the things that was discovered about 18 months ago was that there is a sort of 'critical mass' required in order to basically grasp what is being proposed here, and that at any level short of that point you won't just see some of it - you will essentially see none of it. It emerges as a singularity in this sense, like the popping of a bubble in the mind, in what we have come to loosely call 'capture'. Bearing in mind that all we are talking about here is understanding it at an intellectual and moral level, not the actual doing of the thing - in the same way that understanding that you can have your appendix taken out is not the same thing as actually removing your appendix. To confuse those two things would obviously be a bit dire.

The other thing we also learned about that 'capture', and at roughly the same time, was that this is apparently very easy to achieve in direct conversation with me - assuming that reaching this point is the focus of the particular conversation you are having - but that it is basically impossible to reach this same point if all you ever do is look over something I have written. For whatever reason, it just doesn't carry over in that format. Not ever.

Does that sound bad? Yes. In my own life this quite sudden discovery was a terrible crossroads, and it took me quite a while to process the implications. I really have no interest at all in speaking to anyone, and yet - consider what's at stake. I simply had to submit myself to the path presented, and be prepared to assist people in this way, at least until something better emerges.

So this was the recent impetus - it was all about this shift from years of writing (tidy failure) to simply talking instead (messy success).

Therefore, and if you recall, the very first thing you will ever have read was the 'Shallow end Invite' - which was essentially nothing but a detailed explanation of this fact, and an invitation to take this brief journey with me in person. To see it for yourself, etc. I mean, it would be hard to get anything else from such a clearly stated injunction. Writing doesn't work, so we are going to need to talk instead - which does work. End of story. But in our case that wasn't so easy to arrange, so we tried this instead, just to see.

Sorry about that. We did already know this. This same essential fork in the road (i.e. that writing doesn't work to reach this essential 'aha moment' here etc) is expressed in pretty much every recent work - it all pivots around this one singular fact: that there is this seminal moment of capture, and that in direct conversation so far 100% of people have reached that point, whereas in writing the number currently stands at zero. Not one, ever.

You might even recall the addendum from Out With The Old, in which I take a bit of a personal detour to explain all the terrible damage associated with the path taken, and in particular the devastation generated over the years by the pervasive unwillingness of people to simply talk about all of this stuff in a normal and natural way, thereby hobbling the writing process by producing an intellectual vacuum. Once again reinforcing the same basic fact: that writing is dead, and the only way forward will be to chat. Or, at the very least, to somehow reach this essential point of capture as a starting point for all further exploration of the territory associated.

But here is the thing - I don't actually believe this couldn't possibly be done in writing, and I am currently working on that possibility as I continue to chat with people directly, seeking to define the essence of it etc, but so far that path has not opened up. It is simply the case that the central insight in this instance always leaves people flummoxed in the first instance, sort of like a turtle that is flipped upside down - and giving them instructions about how to get themselves back up the right way simply doesn't help. No matter what you say they just don't seem to be able to manage it, but in conversation you can just reach out and flip them quite easily. So it isn't a problem, but it does mean that we need to chat for this purpose, at least once.

So just to be clear - I completely blame myself for all of this mess. I should have known better. So at the point where you had already gone through all the introductory material, and asked me for access to the bigger books - saying that you just wanted to see where all of this is going - I should never have agreed. We should have simply waited until we had a chance to sit down for a few hours, based on what you had already seen, just so that I could make sure for myself that you at least had all those pieces lined up correctly. This is the way.

This is what we had already learned, but in your case I made an exception, and quite wrongly so. Clearly. There have literally been no exceptions to this rule so far, not one, and this is nothing but one more sad confirmation of that fact.

So at this stage you might say that this is one of the immutable laws of 2EQ - there is no avoiding this initial 'orientation' chat. Even for someone as smart as you. The primary linkage here appears to be such high voltage that nobody ever just naturally connects it up without being shown how, and in the absence of that the machine just won't run. So everyone goes off the rails in this sense, right at the start, and if they don't get put back on then they will run for miles and miles in the wrong direction, without realising the mistake.

Fortunately, however, it's very easy to fix. And I would have fixed this ages ago here, if there had been any opportunities for that. But it was a very unusual situation. With you being off the grid, and with such a dearth of feedback as a result, it really was impossible to get a sonar ping that might tell me where you were actually located in this regard.

So none of this would be necessary if we had simply sat down to chew all of this over in a normal and natural way - to take a look together, rather than alone. And I'm not sure what to do regarding any confusions being expressed here now, in light of the wrong path being taken so early on. It's a bit embarrassing for me, to have to backtrack so far. But we can at least address the big errors below in more detail, in case you are interested. Hopefully I can fix my screw up here, and tidy up the mess.

•

The problem here is that you are still away, but since we are here, I will do what would otherwise be done in conversation much more simply. I will correct the errors, at least the ones I know about. There may be many more I guess, that I can't see from this distance, which is sort of what I am saying. This static one way form just doesn't work, no matter how high you stack it.

That's all it is. The initial conversation I mean - it isn't even anything particularly complicated. It's just the avoidance of dozens of potential potholes, by having the opportunity to be led in the first instance by someone who knows the territory, and then to be left standing very firmly at the first main lookout point.

It is the paradigm itself that does the main work, it is merely the view from there. And I have seen it enough times now to know that you have certainly not reached that elementary point here yet, which is in turn the main reason for your current ambivalence.

Not that you should be interested - just that you would be, and not based on anything I say or do, but merely based on your own natural perceptions, which would certainly have shifted by then. And here we see proof once again, with a major misalignment that never would have survived 5 mins in the heat of actual conversation.

In any case you seem to have confused these two events - this pending conversation, and the much deeper transition event in the individual. Somehow you are imagining these two points are the same thing? That this deep 'transformational potential' might be realised merely within the context of a conversation with me?

Oh my lord. This really is an extremely disturbing possibility, but it would explain a lot. These two things are not even related. Not directly. Except that the former in one case may inevitably lead to the latter in everyone. But to see how they are connected requires the entire cascade of events associated, which we clearly haven't carried over here at this point. What we see here are two different ends of the stick, so to speak.

Anyway, I am going to at least clear this one up here for good, as just one example of the type of issue we might immediately sweep away the moment we got the time to have even a single long form conversation about all of this. I believe just one would be enough in your own case, given how much you have already read.

There is another entire level of the same conversation possible here - the full breakdown of the paradigm from the start with a fresh mind - but that is at the next stage in, and a far bigger deal. We generally call that sequence the 'icebreaker', which is a much deeper dive that will require a very intelligent participant, or two, or three, each time we do it. But that comes later, and only for those who are ready for such. At first we are only talking about a toe in the water.

Therefore, let's at least pull these two apart here -

If the conversation is the small thing, then what is the big thing? If that initial 'capture' is one of the things you have conflated in this mix up, then what is the other? What is the far deeper thing you imagined that conversation might somehow deliver?

In other words, what am I basically saying here? In particular, what is emerging here that has not been seen before?

Somehow you have misconstrued the nature and significance of the potential being indicated - that it might merely be some kind of mental thing, as if that might occur based on an intellectual realisation, or some merely cognitive insight etc. Some psychological gymnastics. But it is far deeper than that. It is a whole bodily shift in state, a deep energetic equilibrium, and may even take weeks or even months to facilitate, and involve all manner of subtle and gross manipulations of various different systems all in a kind of symphony of transition.

So does it sound complicated? Yes mate. It really is. In particular it is very dynamic. And that's why people need to get together to open it up and study all of the anatomy associated. It is so that something very complicated (far beyond what any individual might manage alone) might be made accessible through the power of collective intelligence.

You are simply thinking too small. Way too small. This is not some easy answer. This is the real answer, the hard answer, but the one that breaks the bank for everyone.

So let's not beat around the bush. We can start with some basic context, and hopefully you will agree with these foundations -

- There is a problem with human life (see - Terror Management Theory).
- There are many attempts to mitigate or manage that problem (see - yoga, meditation, etc).
- None of these methods actually work (see - people everywhere).

What am I missing here mate? Anything? You are saying that what is being outlined here has been around for ages? No. And how do we know this? Because what I am suggesting is not just an idea.

One very clear distinction needs to be drawn here, and this gets right down to the heart of what is being claimed. The emergent framework (totally inimitable as far as I know - not that I care) is a view that defines the underlying anatomy of this smouldering event in each individual, and in particular that defines it as being integrated and singular in nature. It is literally like a separate organism in a sense, like a climbing plant, a weed that has sprouted and grown over everything, but that ultimately has a single tap root.

So this is one thing. Are you saying this is not new? Can you point to anything that delivers this framework in a context that defines it as being a distinctly extrinsic and discrete event, a standalone structure with a single active nexus at its root, and also in enough resolution to be able to directly manipulate that event in practical terms? As this view does?

I mean, practically push it around? Poke the octopus? Make it squirm?

No. This is new. Does it allow for this? Yes.

For instance, every one of the 'containments' indicated in O.P. can be directly modulated and influenced in a kind of functional judo if you know how, and there are already lots of practical modalities that do know how. I could rattle off an entire list, mindfulness included. An entire repertoire of practical tools and frameworks. But none of those has any lasting or significant effect unless applied with very significant determination, thereby placing the benefits beyond the reach of most. And the reason for this is that each of these approaches only targets a single limb of this slippery octopus, so it is a bit like squeezing a balloon that is caught in a fence - it will shrink on this side if you do that, but will only grow on the other side as a result, where you aren't looking. Except that in this case it has about eight sides, eight limbs etc - hence octopus.

So why don't things like meditation ultimately work, without constant and relentless effort? It is because they represent only a tiny section of the entire structure, one eighth etc, and because even that small part is dynamically connected to a much larger whole that will simply shift and accommodate any change - usually with worse outcomes overall.

In general, this system will already be maintaining the most efficient pattern of management available, so if you push it, you will generally only be making things worse. It all represents a very stable equilibrium.

I mean - did you do your yoga today? No. Would you benefit from doing that? Yes. So what's wrong with you? Nothing bro.

Yoga is broken. And so is the atman vichara, holotropic breathwork, deep fascia release, vipassana meditation, and all the rest. They all miss the bigger picture, and the true context.

It is energy that matters - motivation vs inertia, willpower vs resistance etc. Tendency over time. The path of least resistance. And the very stable tendency at present is for most people to be trapped in a state that is actually far more conflicted than they will generally admit.

As Thoreau put it - “the mass of men lead lives of quiet desperation”.

But here is the other thing -

Would you agree that we do currently (although very rarely at present) see evidence for another very extreme human potential, wherein some kind of ‘miraculous’ liberation has taken place within some individual? And that in this event a great many drivers of internal tendency will somehow spontaneously invert? Permanently.

How do you currently explain that? Do you even bother? Do you think this is real or not?

First of all, then, I have this one question to ask you -

Do you accept that this event does indeed happen? Sometimes? That there is ‘something’ that ‘somehow’ has the ability to radically transform an individual’s entire state, and that we do already see this on rare occasions. If you don’t, then I am clearly going to need to arrange a meeting for you.

I personally saw this happen several times, under the microscope as it were. I saw the before, the during, and the after of it. That’s where all of this began for me, all those years ago. But it is not as rare as it used to be, so if you are not basically aware of the universal trajectory of this particular story, as it has been expressed occasionally in every culture throughout time, then you have probably been hiding under a rock somewhere.

How consistent are those stories? Very consistent mate. It is absolutely real. And these people I knew have never been the same. So I am going to take this aspect as read here for now. You can come back to me if this part is in any doubt.

With that in mind, then, have you ever heard of an example of it that was not described as a ‘moment in time’ realization? No. It is a transition between two stable states (the balloon or no balloon from above) and there is essentially no middle state.

This is what the 2EQ model predicts, and this is also what we see in the world very clearly, whenever this occurs. Think of a ball rolling around in a bowl, and then imagine there are actually two bowls not one - this is what 2EQ defines. Two stable states, two different equilibriums (2EQ). But when you are standing inside one of these bowls, there is no way to see that the entire other possibility even exists, let alone which direction to move. And the steep sides of these bowls represent stress in this model, so you would also never go up there just to have a look.

The peak of tension that separates these two bowls is like a slippery hump, you cannot balance there, so you are either in one state at any given moment, or in the other state. There is no third state. It's like being born, or not born. The moment you take that first breath, that's it - the placenta detaches immediately. You can never go back. But actually a dam bursting is probably a better descriptive metaphor, in order to explain the one way 'arrow of time' aspect of the transition being defined - it does not just reverse itself somehow once it has occurred.

Therefore, and as I say, it strikes me now that you have perhaps never actually met one of those people, and that as a result of this you are left to see this entire picture from within only the framework of those you know, and the limits associated. All you see is people heroically pushing that boulder up an increasingly steep hill, with the assumption that the best approaches are the ones that do this most powerfully. And in particular you most likely see people everywhere around you just changing their minds about stuff. As with the 'capture' I have been speaking about - that is a very deep shift, I am not discounting that sort of thing here, especially when - as in this instance - it might lead to other more important things. But that's not what we are talking about here at all. That is pointless. That's what I am saying here. That really is the main and only message.

There is ANOTHER ENTIRE STATE - another completely different equilibrium for every person. And if you don't actually believe this, then as I say, you have too narrow a circle of friends.

It is very real mate. And it should not be confused with any sort of shallow manipulation, or attention based alteration of experience or functioning. It is a structural fact, clear and separate from all of that struggle and confusion, not just some transient effect.

So what is that? What explains it? Can you explain it?

I can. That's what I'm saying. And the only reason you don't believe that is because you haven't actually spoken to me about it yet. Not at that level - at the only appropriate level in this instance, given the obvious implications.

I only thought you might want to know, given how interested you are in such things.

This is the only part that matters, and the part that you definitely haven't seen before -

The anatomy provided (that you already have from the documents - the 'containments' in O.P. etc, and the end sections of S.E. regarding the restoration of energetic integrity) captures the overall functional dynamics in enough detail to be able to quite clearly define exactly what that potential is, along with a pretty clear indication of how to achieve it.

If you doubt this then you have so far only collected all the pieces, but haven't yet put that engine together. You need to do the intellectual work associated, obviously. And that's only the small tip of the iceberg in that sense, there is a great deal more that has never been written down, but that is information I am also offering freely now - how to turn all of those instruments into a symphony, etc.

Once again, that's what conversation very rapidly achieves for anyone, that's what it makes available. But yes - only from the horse's mouth at this point. It's all there in the books already, but people just don't seem to be smart enough - or motivated enough - to put all of that together for themselves. Which is why I'm offering to help.

It's quite a shock when you really see it for the first time. Maybe too much of a shock perhaps. It's just too big. But in the end that is only a grasp of the theory, which can be quite a big deal in itself, but that has nothing to do with the practice.

You are saying you have seen either of these things before, either this particular theory, or this deep transition event in a freely available cascading sense? No mate. And if you think so then you have completely missed what I am saying here.

You won't miss it. And there is no way the theory associated will emerge anywhere without the practical dimension emerging almost immediately thereafter, because it is completely obvious. That event is also just as obvious in real life, whenever it occurs. It is not just some transient bit of personal equanimity that is generated on the basis of significant effort and will.

That sort of rubbish is going nowhere, if only because willpower is in too short supply. People are basically just too dumb for anything like that to have any lasting or significant effect in the world.

But this other thing, that is completely different, and at another whole level of depth and significance. That is the taking of the mountain to Mohammed, so to speak. 'Existential Emancipation for Dummies' etc. But somehow you have completely missed what is being suggested in that sense. It is absolutely singular, and completely unequivocal. It requires no effort whatsoever to be maintained. There is no practice associated, not afterwards. It's a one time thing.

So what explains this far more radical potential? It's not even that complicated, but somehow people don't grasp the basic implications even when it is stated very simply.

If the underlying event is an integrated singularity, then if you push it off balance, it will simply wobble a bit and then return to where it was before. Like pruning a bush it will just grow back. And this is meditation.

You really think there are demonstrably effective interventions currently? Rubbish. They are all futile and essentially worthless, if only because they all fail to grasp what is really going on.

This is what the bowl metaphor captures - and what 2EQ means.

There are two stable equilibriums, and for the most part all efforts people make merely represent the ball rolling around within the current state. So you can meditate, or you can play PS5, and these are basically the same thing from the perspective of 2EQ. All of that is nothing, not compared to the only truly significant possibility - which is to transition to the other state, the other bowl, the second equilibrium.

So is meditating better than PS5? No. Neither of them is better than just going and getting drunk, or taking a nap, or riding a bike up a hill. All actions that do not exit the bowl are essentially the same action from this perspective. Only fundamentally resolving the issue matters, and nothing so shallow as a bit of self-reflection will ever achieve that.

So you think this has occurred before? You believe someone is making this very profound possibility available on some reliable basis? Rubbish. No mate. This has never occurred before - ever.

How do I know? Because like aviation it basically cannot occur without a theory that is capable of achieving the function of both explaining and predicting - a theory that has to not only be right but also comprehensive enough to meet this practically applicable threshold. It needs to capture this very slippery octopus. And even if the theory does not quite reach this level at first, it needs to be complete enough to be able to grow into that form over time. And that's what we see here.

Actually, this is already directly applicable in its current fledgeling form, although not by any individual. It would still need to be understood by a group, and then applied in some unified manner. But there is definitely already enough of a recipe here to get a pancake, so to speak, provided you give that recipe to a chef rather than a child. Which is what we mean when we talk about selecting the right audience now. But it is also what we mean when we talk about this initial conversation - it is altogether just a hell of a lot simpler to show someone how to make a pancake, than to try to explain it on a page. A picture tells a thousand words etc.

This 'singularity' is what you don't yet seem to understand, but I think this is quite easy to establish.

Which part doesn't make sense to you?

Do you accept that this shift occurs? That it exists? Even theoretically as a possibility? Would it make sense?

Do you not also accept that certain things must occur in order to facilitate or define this shift from one to the other? Clearly.

So your only real option here, if you are going to counter any of this, is to either say that this entire potential doesn't even exist, or to say that it must forever remain mysterious and unknowable. But we are scientists, right! Fuck mysticism - this can all be entirely known. And that's all I'm saying really.

Do you not accept this, even as a premise worth exploring? Why not?

Therefore, can we agree that the 'problem' being indicated might indeed be integrated, singular, and basically universal in form? What doesn't make sense about that? And based on this, that the 'solution' to that entire dilemma might be both singular and unequivocal, based on the nature of the event that is undone? That it might merely be the removal of a body of subversive activity that broadly fits the description offered? That being an existential containment event?

This is foundational, so if you cannot accept this 'Houston, we have a problem' aspect then we are basically fucked here. But this really would be difficult to accept in light of all the research that now supports this claim (see - TMT once again), unless you are going to posit that the underlying event they have been researching for so many years is somehow intrinsic to us. But do you see any foundation that might support that possibility? Would that even make sense? Do we see death anxiety in any other animals/ Anywhere at all? Not that I am aware of.

This is the entire basis of the paradigm here - essentially that the event approaches like TMT study really does exist, but also that it is merely an added and non intrinsic self-enclosing confusion, and therefore entirely surplus to requirements. It does not exist in the hardware at all, and also that the human system essentially has a 'hard reset' option, where it can be 'restored' to factory settings. It's just that nobody knew where the button was, or the particular keystroke combination associated with achieving that reset. And that's what 2EQ provides for.

Does that make sense or not? The fact that it is singular, and added, and has the particular anatomy associated (as defined broadly in the containments section of O.P.) along with the transition definition (as outlined at the end of S.E. etc) means that it can be functionally undone in a singular defining collapse, and that the threshold associated can be intentionally and strategically aimed for and achieved.

It is implied. But not by an individual! How many times do I need to say this? So why are you looking at me? You want me to achieve this relinquishment in someone merely by talking to them? I honestly have no idea where you are coming from. What the hell.

It is much bigger than that. You are thinking way too small. So I don't know how to get this across, not in writing, that's what I have been saying. That's what this conversation would make clear. Maybe I should wait until you are back. But I will keep going anyway, and see where we end up..

Like nuclear fission, this singular deeper 'transformative' possibility would still be true if we never saw it already in nature, but we actually do in this case, at least occasionally. What we are talking about is a very deep and completely permanent shift in a person, like being turned inside out, with a very stressful transition along the way, as indicated with the pickle ball metaphor. And what we are pointing to here is making that potential practically and reliably accessible for the first time ever - to everyone, everywhere.

But I don't mean in conversation mate. That is a completely different upstream level. That perception makes my forehead crinkle up in dismay. Yes, we are also talking about explaining it in a balanced and rational manner - a framework that is not only capable of making sense of it afterwards, but also empowering that transition prior. But that is only theory.

I mean, I have been mentioning TMT here a bit, if only because I have been fortunate enough to have one of TMT's heavyweight theorists explain to me where this might all fit within the current and historical landscape, at least in broad terms. There are certainly others who have come close. But no, Becker did not say this, and neither did Heidegger. I think this has also become clear. They only pointed in the general direction, at the 'problem end' so to speak, but missed the essential crux.

And then we see all those less scientific approaches at the 'solution end', with their frankly archaic or 'mystical' theoretical foundations, and their equally unreliable results.

There is only one really important key here -

So tell me, do any of those approaches functionally remove the event they indicate? NO.

But can it be functionally removed? YES!

So let's be clear - this potential has NOT been floating around in the mists for ages. And if you think it has, then please explain where. That would be very interesting to me. I have been looking, mate, believe me - because if that had occurred, even once, anywhere at all, then I wouldn't need to step up and say any of this. That would be heaven.

So please - show me. Point to it.

No mate, it is completely absent. And nothing is going to make this absence more glaringly obvious than the moment it does actually arrive.

Like aviation theory, the paradigm here will both enable as well as explain the practical potential indicated. But the application in practice is the real thing here, actually doing it is the only true aim. Theory is nothing if it does not lead to action. Only 'actually flying' matters. What would be the point of aviation theory if it didn't achieve this in the end? There would be none. And this is what irks me whenever psychology becomes too intellectualised, when it starts to become an end unto itself, rather than being applied in real life. It is possible that 2EQ may even give a few of these approaches the teeth they have been missing for all this time.

It all reminds me of this also -

"Some have said that 'knowledge is power'. That is only a half truth. For knowledge becomes power only when it is put into action for the attainment of a definite objective."

<https://www.facebook.com/share/r/1BcGT4WWtZ/>

-- Napoleon Hill

"The purpose of knowledge is action, not knowledge."

-- Aristotle

So let's work back from the end point -

The moment that transition is able to be stimulated/facilitated, even in a particularly receptive cohort, the pending spiral of development associated will immediately become unstoppable. From Wright Bros to Jumbo Jets was basically an automatic elevator ride.

Do you see this? At that point it couldn't have been stopped. The cat was already out of the bag.

So what does that mean in this instance? It means that all people, everywhere, will then be 'spiritually enlightened' in due course.

I mean, perhaps this is too big for you to grasp? But even that is the wrong terminology, do you see? The release event itself is very real, and even the historical descriptions are accurate from a subjective point of view, but what it is objectively has been deeply misrepresented.

Put it this way - do you accept that:

1. There is a very distinct shift possible?
2. That there might be things that make that more or less likely to occur?
3. That those things might be known, if you managed to piece together some idea of what is going on?
4. That knowing might allow you to affect the likelihood of achieving that transition?

You think practices exist currently that achieve this? Bullshit. You can't show me even one. Not at this level. None of those have any teeth, not one, if only because they require will and skill that is in too high demand. That's all just rolling the ball up the hill with effort in the right direction, at best. It will always just roll back again before long. So that's not it. That's going nowhere. That's all just too much effort for too little reward.

Enlightenment (or whatever name it might be given once it is correctly defined) is not mindfulness. These are two completely different things, structurally speaking. One is emptying the bucket with a teaspoon, the other is using your boot to blow the whole bottom of the bucket right out. So I personally wouldn't touch mindfulness with a barge pole, nor any other currently available modality, not on its own - not unless it was applied within this far more critical broader framework. That's all great stuff, but whatever I decided to use in any instance would need to be a means not an end, as well as take into account the far larger and more dynamic event associated, and the end would need to be the right end. And there is only one right end in this picture: The whole octopus.

So if we go back to our 'octopus balloon' metaphor from earlier, with its eight or so limbs, then what we see is a situation where the body of the octopus will not pop up into view until you push all eight of its limbs at once, so as to prevent displacement into even one of those limbs that you missed. And only then do you get an opportunity to pop it at its core.

Some of those limbs are also deeply anchored into physical structures, and may take weeks or months to displace, whereas others are purely mental, and may only take minutes. And some only become accessible under certain circumstances, and if those prerequisite conditions are not met then seeking to shift them is like firing a gun with no bullets in it.

For instance, Ramana Maharshi's Atman Vichara (or 'self enquiry') is an injunction that really only ever needs to be applied once. Just one time. After all, how many times did he use it in order to achieve his 'profoundly enlightened' state? Once. So if it doesn't work the first time up then you have seemingly overlooked the far more important prerequisite loadings that might prime that injunction, like loading the gun. And that's what you hear at ashrams all over India - click click click as people sit there endlessly pulling the trigger on empty guns, without understanding the far more important deeper anatomy of what they are seeking to achieve.

So what are they, these deeper shifts? These prerequisite loadings? Do you know? No.

I know. That's what I'm saying. And I'm not saying that to get one up on you, I'm not 12 years old. I simply know because I have a model that predicts such, among other things. Ask me. I'm happy to tell you. I'm not even going to make you pay, although I certainly could, given what it's worth. But honestly, fuck trying to explain all of that in writing. So let's have a beer when you are back.

But yes - you asked me to define what that entire transition process would entail, and yes, that's probably possible, at least in outline. It's not even that complicated once you have the model constructed. Unfortunately you don't quite have that yet, so we remain a bit stuck. You wouldn't understand it even if I explained. So once again, you are going to have to get the required dynamic framework first, in the context of chat. Damn. All things in good time mate, all these destinations are in store for those who are on the train.

Just to be clear, then, it is a scientific claim. Entirely falsifiable. Carl Popper would eat this for breakfast. It's just not bookish. It's the proverbial hot-seat. The moral shift associated is not something to observe second hand - you have to see it (be it) for yourself.

In any case, that was just one of dozens of possible examples of where current modalities confront similar roadblocks due to having theoretical foundations that are fundamentally just too shallow to meaningfully capture the true nature of what is being addressed - like the City of London killing all the cats because they thought they were causing the plague, when actually it was fleas, and the fleas were mostly carried by rats, so they only made the situation much worse.

I mean how many people seeking 'spiritual enlightenment' die having achieved that stated goal? None. Give or take. How much of their life was lived in that radiant state? None. Likewise. But how much time was wasted in pursuit of that, when they could have been snorkeling in the Maldives or drinking wine in France? Far too much.

It is all a big fraud. And yet the potential itself is real, as I say. But take a look - almost every person who actually finds it did not do so as the result of any intentional act. Ramana - it just happened. Eckhart - it just happened. Sadguru - it just happened. None of them were seeking it. And none of them can reliably repeat it in others. Not every time a coconut. Let alone explain what it actually is.

This completeness is what 2EQ offers finally - we have the whole octopus laid out here at last, without any significant or important element missing. And only with that do we see the possibility of a fundamental resolution, rather than just some transient and temporary displacement of this entire issue into some other area of life.

But just to confirm, one last time, in case it has swept away yet again - I do not mean that any single individual is going to be able to achieve this transition in any other single individual - ever! So when I use the term jumbo jet repeatedly I am not talking about a children's toy that might fit in your pocket. I am talking about a 400 ton monster that is produced by 5,000 people. To which you might say oh my god that's simply too much to ask - until you realise that we are talking about changing the entire fucking world, in a single generation. Except in this case we might only be talking about a dozen people in the first instance, in order to reach that Wright Brothers moment, where that jumbo jet variation becomes an inevitable outcome in due course.

I mean even now, what do you think looking back at the Wright brothers? That might have been amazing for its time, but do you not believe that you could get together with a few people - over a month or two - and get yourself off the ground in some controlled manner? I know for certain that I could do that just by myself, with only stuff I purchased from Home Depot.

What's the big deal?

So we might add another set of bullets here, just to clarify the bigger picture -

- A. The potential is presently completely hidden from view.
- B. The transition associated is singular and unequivocal.
- C. The moment that is functionally understood it will immediately become available to everyone.

As I say, you are simply not grasping the scale of what is being proposed. It is not even a failure of imagination on anyone's part. This is just how it always is in this case, nobody ever sees the forest for the trees here at first. That's the whole point of what we discovered. Not ever.

So what is it that people do see from that first lookout? Just this - that any kind of practice is basically worthless if it does not directly and by the shortest path possible target a state where the outcomes associated become EFFORTLESSLY established as PERMANENT features of NORMAL waking consciousness. And currently this failure is EVERYTHING we see in the world today. They all fall short of this critical mark. That line would only need to be crossed once for the entire dam to burst in this instance.

Which is to say - they have to EXIT the current very stable equilibrium. So if you have to keep doing it, then it's shit. That means you missed the mark, and fell short. In general that probably means you don't even really know what the true mark is.

This mark is what the 2EQ framework defines. It explains what so-called 'enlightenment' actually is. And also which way to move in order to reach that. Not in any simple way, but in a complex dynamical sense. It is a full meal mate, not a bit of interesting theoretical bubblegum - a real world event, not just one more example of convoluted philosturbation. It explains how to actually relocate the dislocated shoulder - whereas all other current approaches fall short both theoretically as well as practically, which means that they just endlessly massage and apply heat packs to make the shoulder feel a bit better about being dislocated. That's all just junk bro!

So what am I saying? The moment you see what is really going on, with all of the dynamic interplay that defines the trap we are in, then how to get out of it becomes completely obvious. But as indicated, once again - like flying - the path it suggests is not an option available to a single individual. But just to be clear - airliners do exist, right? Why? Because they have utility, and because there was a certain moment when the possibility became apparent to everyone. And on the brink of that 'oh shit look at that' moment is where we stand here now.

It is only about what we see, what we do will then be automatic. And even now, you haven't really seen it. This is my point. That's all 'capture' is. Just seeing, not doing.

So in just the same way as flying, the much more significant practical event defines a group endeavour by implication. It will take a group of people to pop an individual in the practical sense, just as you can't solo bungee jump. It's a team game. At first anyway. In the future AI will probably be able to navigate it. But the whole thing needs to be institutionalized at first, so that development can be stable and incrementally recorded etc, and more powerfully and carefully deployed.

I know I keep saying it, but you are simply misunderstanding the scale here somehow. The main event is apparently much bigger than you can easily grasp. But as I say, this is completely normal during the very early stages, prior to capture.

For me it is like having a balloon, and offering to show someone my balloon. And they will say they want to take a look, as they then immediately try to blow it up within the confines of their little narrow office or living room. Which is only natural, in light of all the little theoretical balloons they have come across before. But that just won't work in this case, because this is not a party balloon - this is a hot air balloon! This one is very much bigger than most people imagine at first, or can even begin to grapple with in any meaningful way.

Therefore, that's what this little journey is right at the start - it is just a quick walk outside with me, once you have the basic package already, and then to try it again, to see what changes.

And suddenly people get it - oh fuck!! Shit, oh I see! Wow! What the hell..

So you are still dramatically underestimating the big event in this instance, because we didn't yet take this little stroll together. As predicted from the very outset. But at the same time you have also been overestimating the nature of the initial chat being indicated. Which is once again my own stupid fault, because I have been amping up the significance of this pending transition, where the theory opens up more broadly within the right arena. That really is a very important moment in this context. But that is only a beginning not an end.

It is also fair to say that I am the only one who really understands the significance of this pending chat, and that others will only really see that when they look back on it all one day. So I should just shut up about that and let it happen. But wouldn't that be unfair? To let someone wander into something so dramatically significant without giving them even so much as a heads-up?

So I have been saying that's a big deal, like an excited puppy, and this combination is apparently what has allowed you to conflate the two things, even though they are very far apart, and very very much different in scale and significance. I really am quite unqualified for all of this stuff, apparently.

So let's lay out the timeline here, from initial insight, to jumbo jet -

map capture (theory)

V

wright bros (practice)

V

Insight—development—communication—collective development—first application—jumbo jet.

So I am saying it's possible to fly across the Atlantic in affordable comfort. But as I said in one of the other works you looked at - the idea that this might occur within a conversation is like asking me to run around the garden with my arms out, just because I said we can all fly. That's simply not what I'm saying at all.

The conversation being indicated is merely the establishment of the first accessible version of aviation theory. From that will come a wider dialogue and eventually application in practice - with inevitable results over time (wright brothers). And the moment that happens the Atlantic scenario becomes a fait accompli.

So that is the sequence of cascading thresholds here. The moment that chat first provides accessible comprehensive capture (comprehension+propagation at the right level), wright brothers becomes a fait accompli, because that combination will break the theoretical deadlock, leading inevitably to the practical deadlock being broken downstream from there as a certain outcome over time. That is the small hole in the dyke. That is this first chat, and we can poke that hole as many times as we wish, but one will probably do it at your level.

Therefore, and once again, you really think this has occurred before, in some reliable and accessible form that can be repeated even in a single person? Do you think that Eckhart Tolle, in all his years of teaching, has managed to stimulate the same transition he experienced in a naturally cascading way, or even to really explain what happened to him in any meaningful sense? No mate. These two things are actually coincident, because in this case understanding will immediately empower realisation. So we would already be living in a completely different world.

You won't miss it, because it is going to be immediately and reliably repeatable - so there will be FMRI machines involved, right from the start. And whatever theories went into producing that practical intervention will be immediately blown up like balloons and written on the sky.

The peak transition in this entire event is when it finally passes from individual to collective for the first time, at the halfway mark - where my journey ends, and where your journey begins. And that's where we stand now. So the next people I speak to, at the right level, are literally being handed the keys to the kingdom - the opportunity to change the world, merely by taking a look.

That's all we are talking about here. We are not talking about involving anyone. We are only taking a look, and in the process shining a spotlight that might allow others to follow along later. That's how those first few get it all for free - all power and no responsibility. They just need to be brave enough to look.

Just to be clear, however, and in case it seems like I am seeking to gain broad acceptance or awareness of this framework, that is precisely what we are seeking to avoid here. For all of this to become public in any sense, or to be broadcast in its detailed form out into wider culture, would only cause panic and stress, and for no gain whatsoever. So the idea here will be to only seed the whole prospect at just the right level - only with those who are both qualified as well as interested. And all behind closed doors. Hence why some of my guys have been thinking about putting this in front of a few select people shortly, just to see what happens when this spark hits the right sort of tinder.

It is what happens elsewhere that matters, however, so those people would be out right from the moment they really see it - because at that moment others would also be able to see it, which would be the only point. We would only be lighting the way by taking a look, not by doing the actual work. It's a lot bigger than that. But currently nobody is even pursuing this, if only because they don't even know it is there. And that's all we would be doing - just making it possible, by allowing others to listen along.

The whole thing is simply absurd, as I say. But no, you haven't seen it yet, so that is the bind.

So what does that much deeper 10 (ish) session 'icebreaker' conversation represent, then, if that is also not this shift? That merely signifies another key moment in the development of the map only. In particular it represents the moment the map becomes more openly available to the level of person who might want to take the journey that map indicates, and explore further. That's all. But that 'mini-threshold' is still important because that line being crossed even once will make the second practical threshold pretty much inevitable over time, because it was only the anatomy that was missing. And it really is missing. Totally absent. And if you don't think so, once again - show me where you think you see it. Anywhere will do.

So the 'capture' we speak about, and that we can now so easily reach in any initial process of dialogue, is only a foot in the door here - just the moment when you first see that all of this is possible, and also how close we are to making it available to everyone, everywhere, if only a few smart people will stop and take a look.

The 'capture' is just aviation theory in outline, the 'icebreaker' is aviation theory in detail, and the first application in practice is the equivalent of Kittyhawk - the beginning of that great transformative wave. That is when the entire thing becomes functionally unstoppable in real and practical terms.

So to confuse these two things - the very first step with the last step - after having read all of that, really is disturbing. But as I say - I blame myself. That's why writing has to end at this point, it just doesn't work, at least not yet.

This jigsaw needs to be put together, and people need help. I should never have allowed this to roll forward without having that chat, and fixing all of these possible misconceptions right at the outset. My bad. And I apologise. It certainly won't ever happen again. I am never again going to engage with anyone, at any level, without first of all checking this basic stuff out with them. The elementary capture becomes first base now.

•

Anyway, hopefully this has at least clarified that much - there is more than one important threshold being indicated. There are actually a whole string of them, and understanding how they all interconnect is pretty much what 2EQ is all about. That is the necklace we would be threading in conversation, one that is clearly impossible to complete in writing.

But this is a very big deal, so what would you have me do? Imagine if that was actually true. Is that not possible? What if I did indeed stumble upon a structural definition of what that 'singularly transformative potential' actually is, and if that turned out to be the summary removal of the very same event outlined in TMT-Becker?

What would you suggest I do - say nothing? Lie about it? Dilly dally about by making vague and tentative gestures? Or just fucking say it? You tell me!

Just don't imagine that you have seen it already mate, what I am actually saying I mean. But you are welcome to, if ever you wish. A single sit down would do it. No sweat. We would already have done this if it had been possible. Alas.

I mean, did this clarify anything for you? Bring the real picture into view? The conversation will do that many times over, all in a single sitting. And no, listening to anyone else have that conversation won't do it, not as effectively anyway, because it is all about personally fitting it to your own existing worldview and prior knowledge etc.

So in the end this has been one more confirmation of a lesson already learned - we always need to chat, and to do that before anyone goes too far down any of the million wrong paths. But until we get the chance, hopefully this has gone some way to fixing up at least a couple of these misconceptions. And my only hope might be that if you now went off and read some of those larger works, with these foundations down first, that you might end up with a completely different appreciation of what was being said there.

Anyway, I'm sure you will let me know your thoughts in great detail, as usual!

Cheers HR

For more information see -
2EQ.org