

OUT WITH THE OLD

Preface

At a recent Christmas BBQ the son of a good friend of ours, who I remember bouncing on my knee as a toddler, managed to get me talking about the stuff I was working on behind the scenes here - and it must have been the beer working, because I generally try to avoid all of that, especially when I'm trying to relax. Anyway, in the end I relented, and gave him a book - but I also told him that if he really wanted to know then we should make a time to sit down and talk about that. And so we did, and in the meantime he intentionally didn't read that book.

You may find a recording of that conversation (Neo Chat) in the same folder as this document, assuming you have been given access by me directly. None of this is for open publication at this point.

Anyway, in preparation for this chat I did give him a link to the documentary movie Flight From Death to have a look at in the interim. I also started to write down a few outlines, and in a couple of days eventually put together what you see below.

I also pinned on an addendum, if only to emphasize a single important point. That snippet is a sort of flashback from a peak of high tension, a bone I was chewing back when it suddenly became clear that I was going to need to speak to people directly about all of this. That really was an impossible shift in many ways, the worst possible scenario, and you will see why when you grasp what is being proposed here, but in the end we somehow needed to make sense of why chatting in person was even necessary.

I had always avoided that possibility over the years, in many ways just because of the demands of the path itself, and just how far beyond my own limits it had left me most of the time. The problem is that it is just too big, it is too deep, and the moral impetus is too powerful. And what that means, for anyone who truly grasps what is being proposed, is that they tend to be moving way too fast relative to the average person, who is always coming in cold. So for any typical person to chat with me about this particular subject has always been a bit like grabbing hold of a door handle on a car that is driving by - it is far more likely to just pull your arm off than actually open the door.

This was why I was always so reticent. The extreme pressure generated by the overall implications of this particular insight made any initial dialogue like taking your thumb off the end of a hose - there might only be a small trickle eventually, but at first you will only tend to get a spray in the face. And nobody ever bothered to persist long enough to get to the calm stage.

Nevertheless, I have found myself opening up this messy personal end of the whole thing, especially in this sort of context, where I am only speaking to a mate. Somehow it seems to release that pressure, and make it far more likely that the underlying message will carry across. It is almost as if the car slows down when this personal aspect is more fully unpacked, and also as if people will start to run faster to catch up to the car once they understand the forces that are pushing it. And with that, we sometimes see the two things falling into alignment at last, and the door will open. People will jump in, and suddenly see for themselves what I have been going on about.

Strangely, this very turbulent story might actually explain it. After all, the scale of the events in question is epic, and one of the things that seems to prevent people from grasping that scale is how calm I can seem, but very few people still think that after reading that addendum. So rather than being a messy distraction, it turns out that my own extremely distressed state - and the reasons for it - might paradoxically be the solution. With that part having been pulled forward, suddenly people find themselves looking around for something big enough to do that much damage, and snap - it all finally comes into view for them.

In this instance, I suppose the idea in writing this down was also to give him something a little more concise to take away at the end of it, just to make sure I didn't miss anything important, but also just to see how different the whole thing might be in writing, as opposed to chatting directly. Having been writing in an intellectual vacuum for so many years, the part of me that writes has become quite dislocated from the constraints of appealing to any particular audience, like a kind of runaway train - all engines and no brakes. And maybe you will see this stark difference for yourself here.

This is why talking has become so important now, not only for the event as a whole, but for me personally. In my case it is like coming up for air after a very long dive. And yet, I do tend to forget just how heavy this stuff is, and I probably blew him away somewhat in that conversation. Not everyone is ready to confront something so profound. And that was another reason for offering this more considered level, it was just so that he might be able to take a slower and more casual walk through the same territory later on, and at his own pace. And also, possibly, to be able to share it to a few select others in due course, which I suppose I have probably done also if you are reading this.

In any case, on with it..

•

Okay so maybe we can start off here by recapping the conversation we had at Christmas, which began with the fact that you are off to university to study design, and possibly choosing a career path in that sense, all in light of how things are going to change very soon in that particular field. And I suppose the question was being asked - what could I tell you in that regard? As an industrial designer myself, how would I explain the deeper context here, as if I was looking back at myself at 18 years old, and what I would like to have known then?

I mean, becoming a graphic designer now? I have known a few, and I can tell you - there is no future in that. And yet, those skills might still be quite useful, I am certainly glad I took the time to develop them myself, but they are really only valuable if you understand the real game beneath all of that.

There is a deeper reality to all of commercial activity that technicians and artisans often overlook in their headlong rush to merely be excellent craftsmen. Whilst technical skill might be critical to have, it is only a tiny aspect of the total picture, a foundation at best. I mean, we have to assume here that you would like to make a living from whatever you do? If so, then there are two ends to that process - the giving end, and the receiving end. Which is to say - there is the bit that is about you, and then there is the bit that is about others. And in practice this tends to be a conflict between pure unbridled creativity at one end, and the hard reality at the other end.

To be purely creative, with no concern for the real world impact on others, or the cost of the process on yourself, is to be a true artist in the archetypal sense. But for most people, who are not somehow talented or lucky enough to make that a sustainable path, such a path might just as clearly define you as an idiot. Whatever it happens to be, for your work to have no ultimate purpose is to miss the point of the entire game, and for your work to cost more than it gives is also a futile endeavor, no matter how amazing the results may be in any other sense.

Creativity needs to be grounded in a deeper process, a more fundamental anchor, like the string that keeps a kite tied to the ground. Untethered creativity is easy, that's just like throwing a piece of paper into the wind - but the real key is to channel it, to discipline the entire thing within a wider framework. There needs to be intention, and you really need to know which way is up in that sense.

And we talked about this the other day in relation to aspects of the creative realm that are not going to be taken over by AI in the next ten years. AI will always have a lot more trouble with elements of this equation that require some deep appreciation of the audience - what they want, who they are, and what they like etc. And for this we used the example of turning a corner in a video game, and wondering what you might find there. It is the job of a really good virtual designer to be able to predict and deliver something that basically aligns with your highest expectations - a sort of wow factor - and this is the part that AI will probably always struggle to manage compared to a truly creative and empathetic human. And this is because you really need to put yourself in the place of that other person, and then imagine for yourself what you would want to see around that corner, in your own perfect world. It would require true generative creativity, along with a deep appreciation of how people basically work. It requires empathy.

This is the basic commercial transaction that underpins any creative work, as defined in the entrepreneurial spirit - which is that your task is to serve. The real game is to give, to make a difference, to leave things better than you found them. This is what it means to finally grow up, it is the thing that many people never realise, which is why they struggle to find happiness and purpose.

Being a child is like the shallow end of the pool in this sense, where you are to some degree insulated from action and consequence, but when you can no longer touch the bottom you really need to know how to swim. And what is that essential water line that you need to be able to keep your head above? Above that line you are a giver - below that line you are a taker. It is that simple. This is the single thread that will define how the entire hanging mobile of your life will come to be arranged, and how balanced it is.

So the job is to add value. But what does that actually mean? It means that your basic task is to interrupt the most elementary process of life that everyone is engaged in - that being first of all figuring out what they want, and secondly how to achieve that. So if you can look at the whole picture of someone's life and somehow take any small part of that tree and replace it with something better, or faster, or more powerful, then you will immediately have improved their state. Or even if you help someone figure out what they really want, the same is true. And what will someone feel if you do this? They will feel good - in particular they will feel good toward you. Which will always tend to make you feel good in turn, if only because when you make people feel better in any sense they have a tendency to want to express that gratitude in some way. And the most common and universally acceptable way this imbalance is leveled out is how? It is by the transfer of money.

This is what it means to be an entrepreneur. It means understanding that life is basically friendship, and that business is just an extension of life in that sense. It is all rooted in an underlying reality about human life - that the brain allowed us to flourish mostly because it allowed us to calculate and regulate fairness within the give and take of everyday mutual exchange. Before we had money we were still able to operate very effectively based on this most fundamental social memory, this belief in natural reciprocity, and calculating this at every moment is what the big human brain seems to have enabled us to do. And it is in this way that we gain all the advantages that mutual cooperation delivers.

Your job, then, as a designer or creator, or whatever you end up doing, is always the same - it is to understand the most basic transaction that you are engaging in. And what is that? It is quite simple once you understand the principle just indicated, which is that you are seeking to improve someone's life, maybe even to improve everyone's life if you can.

But surely there are many very successful endeavors that don't conform to this model? And this is true, there are many instances where business level transactions do not fit this pattern. There are a great many morally inept teenagers who are making brain rotting tiktok videos that damage the developing minds of children all over the world, and who are driving custom Lamborghinis as a result. But is that success? No. That's not success, any more than the Russian crime boss on his 150m yacht in the Seychelles is an example of success. All that tells us is that life is, as it always was, a jungle - and that there are always going to be predators, opportunists, and parasites. The question in that context is - do you really want to be one of them?

These are obviously very big questions. What does it mean to be a good person, and to live a good life? What does it mean to make a difference? And if you do figure this out, how can you turn that into a realistic livelihood?

In many ways the world seems to be a bit broken in this regard, set up so as to reward the worst transactions, rather than the best. So it is always tempting to just become a taker, and to forget about the impact you have.

Equally bad, it can be just as tempting to sacrifice yourself too deeply in pursuit of a higher good. This is another important factor in all of it - how to make the biggest difference possible, but without it costing you more than you can realistically give? This is another key dimension to consider whenever you are balancing up the overall symmetry of your creative pursuits in life. If what you give to others costs you the same as what you deliver, then how did that make the world a better place? And more obviously - how could that possibly be sustainable?

It is always easy to make money from sweat and blood, so to speak. But that is also the very essence of powerless stupidity. That is the street vendor in Thailand who is making spicy chicken on a skewer, the child making bricks from mud, or the guy working on a machine in a factory. And yet we perceive such efforts differently due to an evolutionary trick of the mind. We somehow see sweat and blood as being an essential ingredient of high value output, but that is actually backwards, and it can ultimately be the main reason people fail to do anything truly good in the world.

It is basically the effort people pay for in that case, which means that the game is never scalable. You basically trade your time for money, and in the end time is all you have. So for as long as you are trading sweat and blood, you will never really succeed in life. Because sweat and blood makes you a slave. And slaves can't help anyone. But the transaction in that instance often works at a social level if only out of pity or obligation, because of what we indicated above about fairness, and the sense that if it costs someone a great deal that it must somehow be worth more. But that's not actually true. A spicy chicken skewer produced by a crafty machine might be indistinguishable from one produced by a person who is slaving over a hot grill.

All I am doing here is pointing out one of the biggest mistakes you can make in life. If you examine this picture carefully you can actually see that what people receive in terms of value has no relationship whatsoever to what delivering that cost you personally. The only thing that correlation measures is your own lack of understanding or creativity. So if you give a lot, but if that costs you a lot, when providing the same value might be delivered in a way that costs virtually nothing, then does that make you a good person? No, that only makes you an idiot, as I indicated above. That is every struggling artist on the planet, many of whom even miss the part about their work having social value.

Therefore, this becomes the second consideration once you have identified the primary game - it is not just about making a difference, but about doing that in a way that optimises this balance between what it costs you at your end to give vs what is delivered at their end in terms of real-life value.

Basically, the question becomes this: how to send something small at your end, that nevertheless lands very heavy once it arrives and is unpacked at the other end?

And once again, this is an aspect of creative life that AI will always be better at, if only because everything AI does is intrinsically scalable. So we need to really focus on this aspect, especially now. We need to learn how to tip this cost-gain balance to its absolute extreme if we are going to keep any advantage and deliver value in a truly competitive way. But if we can do this, if we can at least add this ingredient to the mix, then we are once again left with the basic equation of how to have a positive impact on the lives of others by either helping them to better figure out what they want, or by helping them achieve that.

It is the why part, rather than the what part, or the how part. It is the why part that AI will always struggle to solve, so that is where you have the advantage.

Creativity is like a horse and cart in this sense, and the question becomes - what is on the cart?

This is what I mean about maintaining some advantage in the next few years. And this was my point I suppose, my point in saying all of this. It is easy to lose your way as you enter any creative field. It is the same thing that happens whenever a really good technician becomes their own boss, and decides to go out on their own - there is often the complete lack of awareness of this entire other side, the deeper reality of the true transaction, which actually has little to do with the art itself, and certainly has nothing at all to do with how much it cost you to produce it. But the moment you pick up the entire bundle of life from this singular thread of making a difference in the lives of others, or in the world, or even the ecosphere as a whole, suddenly everything else starts to fall into place. All of a sudden you come to see where all the parts fit, and what the real questions are, what the real game is. You realise that making amazing stuff that personally costs you a huge amount is not a sustainable path - not unless you happen to make it as an artist.

Devoting yourself to your own highest expression (and thereby experiencing direct fulfilment internally) may occasionally align with the production of something that others find equally rewarding. But that is rare, and even if you succeed you will only ever produce a few items if the cost is too high, because the outcome is not immediately or infinitely scalable.

So what are we left with? In the end we are left to ask the question about what is really going on with people, and how to possibly make the biggest difference we can, at the least personal cost, and in a way that is freely scalable. This is the recipe.

This brings us to my own answer to this question I suppose. I personally think that there is really only one prescription here, and it all boils down to fundamental human honesty.

If you have even half a brain, you very soon understand that there really is something very wrong with life in general, and with people in particular. I understand this might not be a very flattering view, but I will seek to explain it below in far more detail. There is a kind of festering wound that lies hidden somewhere below the surface of life, a kind of lie that we are all telling to each other, and to ourselves. And this in turn leaves us with two basic options when it comes to the whole idea of adding value and making the world a better place - we can be part of the crew that is covering this underlying issue over, or part of the crew that is opening this underlying issue up. Which is to say - we all have the same pile of shit in the middle of our living room, so the only choice is whether you carry a can of whipped cream that you use to cover it up, or a shovel you use to dig.

So this will be your choice in life, one that will define almost everything about you over time - are you putting more whipped cream on top of this universally shared pile of shit, or are you blowing the whipped cream away and taking a look beneath?

Needless to say, there are two types of people in this regard, and they don't tend to like each other much. I obviously chose the shovel. But if you end up choosing the shovel also, once you see what is really going on, then you need to know that this will make you rare indeed. Most people choose to cover this septic inner wound up with layers of soggy old bandages, and to try to forget it is even there, rather than open it up to the light and allow it to heal.

Therefore, and even if you choose to make a difference for people, you will still face this most fundamental choice - how? Do you want to make people feel better about a fundamentally bad situation? Or would you rather just fix that situation for them, so it isn't so bad?

If your choice is the second option, then what you will find is that the path is not so much about offering people ways to avoid what is really going on beneath the surface levels of life, but far more about being prepared to delve into and explore all of the really dark stuff in the depths of our being. It is about beginning to dig into the true nature of the real problems people are dealing with, and in the process hopefully coming away with at least some idea of how all of that works, and maybe even what might be done about it. We need to pull it all apart, see how it works, and in the end hopefully be able to fix some of it - at least to some degree.

So we have been talking about all of this from within the very narrow boundaries of your own situation - that being an 18 year old who is about to begin studying graphics, and how to perhaps be able to ground all of that within a broader framework. How might you make those skills valuable as part of a broader event, and especially so as to do that in a way that avoids placing yourself in competition with the emerging AI that is coming? All of that is clearly going to completely wipe out graphics within about 5 years, and certainly within the next ten. Really, of all the careers you could possibly choose at this time in history, graphics is not a path that has any future. Not on its own. But these skills might still be essential as part of a broader repertoire for anyone who chooses to have an impact on the world, in any higher sense.

But my real point is this - what if you took this basic approach to its ultimate limits, to the end of the line, and took all the restrictions off? What would be the final and ultimate expression of such a path, and such a journey, if that was your chosen approach? Why not separate out this deeper question and blow it up like a balloon all on its own, free of any surface level constraints? What is the transcendent skill you could learn at this time, regardless of what you choose to study, that would set you up for life?

Which is to say - How much difference could a single person actually make, and what is the deepest issue we all face, right down at the very root of our being? And if that root of private suffering can be sufficiently penetrated and understood, can that wound be healed?

I mean, why not ask the really big question here, or at least know what the really big question is?

So this will be the point here I suppose - to leave this small question behind, and to take a look at this far deeper subject, and not so as to say that you should consider that path for yourself, but merely so as to indicate what it might look like if you did really take all the limits off such an enquiry.

In this context I can only tell my own story, and show you my own answer to the questions posed above, if only to illustrate what all of that might look like if you decided to really not fuck around. I took a very unusual path in this sense, choosing to abandon anything mediocre in favour of something a little more extreme. But I guess that's how I think about it - if you are going to have a pet, you might as well have an elephant, right!

Anyway, you can make your own mind up once you see it. It's just a view to consider. And I am not even going to tell you that this is true. It is only a possibility to think about. But one thing is for sure, you will not hear this anywhere else. It is completely hidden from view at this time, and the reasons for this will become obvious, as we will see. You really only need to see what it has cost in order to see why nobody else has ever managed to capture and communicate this particular insight. You really would have to be crazy to do this. But the only thing here will be to see it, merely as another explanation for what is actually going on.

But to be clear - I am not seeking to recruit you in any sense. As you will see you probably wouldn't qualify for the path it indicates. Very few will. Fortunately, however, only a few will be required in this instance, and they shouldn't be too hard to find, not now that we have the picture coming so clearly into view at last.

Therefore, the purpose of this brief recap here was merely to frame what follows as my own answer to that same question. So you can look at it and see for yourself how many problems it potentially stands to solve, if it does happen to be correct. But you will also need to forgive how simplistic this explanation will be. The idea here will be for this to end up as brief as possible, whilst still picking up enough detail to talk about all of this in a meaningful way.

•

Anyway, here we go -

We can maybe go back for a moment to that most basic assumption we started off with in the recap, and the trust we seem to place on it: how people are all basically engaged in the same process overall, on one hand seeking to define what it is that they want, and on the other seeking to acquire or achieve that in some way.

Every approach to life and success is playing this game at face value, like an instrument as it is handed to you - presuming that this is right, and correct, and all we have to work with. So that every possible avenue of inquiry, or action, will inevitably be just some version of the same old picture: that of making your way ahead in life by tuning yourself to this basic reality in other people, and in yourself.

It is all about either helping them to figure out what they want, or in some way providing easier access to it. But what if that instrument is actually broken? Did you ever think about that possibility? What then? Somehow what we see is that people (very mysteriously) often don't actually know what they want, on the one hand, or on the other that they don't know how to get it. Or even worse than that, even if they do manage it - they either don't particularly enjoy it, or if they do that it is somehow often not very good for them. There is something going wrong here.

So we are going to take a dramatic turn here right at the outset, as indicated in our whipped cream vs shovel analogy already mentioned. We will start off with the most foundational observation - that the world is pretty fucked up, and people also. There is something profound going on within the average individual that is rarely discussed, like a secret we are all keeping from ourselves, and each other.

Indeed, from my rather biased perspective, if you don't already presume this then you are simply a complete moron, but maybe that's just me. The whole view that everything is just fine, and that the world is basically okay, is a view we will get to in due course - but only once we start talking about what is really wrong with the world, which is where that view probably fits. But yes, many people really are so scared and defeated that their only real answer to some of the deeper questions in life is to simply deny that they even exist.

And this is where I started this same journey when I was 18 years old. This is where I began - with this same question. There was something deeper going on, something wrong with people, and somehow it was sitting right in front of us but we couldn't see it. So I went looking. I was working on a construction site at the time, and I used to run for miles in my lunch break downtown to a new age bookshop so that I could dig through the psychology section, and that was where all my money went. And so it was, for years on end. Eventually, and after about a decade of very intense exploration of every rabbit hole I could find, I ended up living upstairs in a 'therapy centre' of sorts, surrounded by lots of interesting people doing interesting stuff on a daily basis.

Anyway, after observing hundreds of people taking this same basic process to its logical extremes, and thereby amplifying the seemingly intractable issues this puzzle contains, this whole experience ultimately led me to a kind of summary conclusion. The accumulation of a huge body of information eventually led to a flash of insight, so to speak. The underlying structure suddenly came into view.

The summary of all that is that there is something going on within the software itself - within the process that is occurring prior to conscious attention and will and emotion. And for the most part, what this means is that people are looking from the problem most of the time, rather than at the problem, and therefore that every move they make is for the most part merely dramatizing the problem they are seeking to overcome, rather than resolving it in any fundamental sense.

This explains why there is first of all a great deal of confusion for people in relation to formulating what it is that they are seeking in life, and secondly why so much of what they seek is not actually aligned with anything we might expect from a biological or evolutionary perspective. It is because the 'system we are' is broken or conflicted at a level deeper than the conscious waking self can easily penetrate, not without having some very explicit and comprehensive maps of the anatomy associated. You really would need to know quite a bit about both how the system works, as well as precisely what has gone wrong with it.

Therefore, this will be what I will seek to explain here, and not only so as to pull up to the surface the exact anatomy of our deepest problem in life, but in doing so to also expose what unavoidably presents itself as the only true deep and lasting solution to the true problem we face - a problem of which all other problems are merely downstream reflections or symptoms.

Needless to say, it is an extremely taboo subject, a banned occupation, and something that you will not be able to do easily with others even if you do find this interesting and powerful for yourself. So just be aware - your friends may not follow you down this path, even if you take a look in this very dark corner. In the future this may change significantly once this fire is lit, but at the present point you will be entering a wilderness that is not occupied by many other people.

Anyway, we are going to need some very basic foundations here in order to understand this anatomy - in terms of its origins as well as its functioning - if we are going to be able to produce a comprehensive picture of what's really going on in the average person, along with what might be done about that. So hopefully you will at least bear with me as I do a little housekeeping here and set the stage for what will come.

We could start off by asking the most fundamental question: what are you? I mean, what do you perceive yourself to be?

I understand this is a profound question, but it is interesting just how perplexing such a simple question is for most people, and how few have ever really asked it. This is curious in itself.

Are you a mind, or a body? Or are you what you feel? Where are you located exactly? Of what do you consist? Surely the answer to this question is going to have some bearing on everything else in your life.

The point here, however, is not that we are going to necessarily answer this question in any comprehensive way, but by the time we are finished we should at least have eliminated quite a few options, as well as gained some kind of framework to help us understand what might be going on in general, even just in broad terms. I think, as you will see, that none of that 'cosmic' level certainty is actually necessary in order to at least define the essential problem we are all suffering from, along with the solution to that problem. So that what we might be left with at the end of the day is not so much an answer to who we are ultimately, but that we might nevertheless be left to simply be who we are ultimately, without all the terrible existential struggle. That underlying conflict is the part that really can be known with a degree of certainty, at least well enough to be able to grapple with it, and perhaps even overcome it in some fundamental sense.

Anyway, I trust you will agree that, whatever you are, you exist on the boundary between two completely different realms - the outside world of objects and relational exchange, and the inside world of thought and feelings and impulses. Also that you are conscious for the most part, and that you can suffer.

So what is basically going on here, and what might have gone wrong? How can we gain some fundamental perspective on the entire process of life so as to tell us which way is basically up, and what is really happening.

Ultimately, and in order to understand who we are in the most essential terms, we really only need to examine where we came from, and the far broader process of which we are apart, which is of course the process of evolution within the total biosphere of the Earth.

We could go into some detail about what life is as opposed to inorganic structure, but we can skip a few billion years here and instead place ourselves up near the top of that emerging tree of biological diversity so as to examine how things have basically worked out for us. And what we see there, in every case, is that all complex organisms have developed methods and processes and structures that are devoted exclusively to managing their complex external and internal transactions in an ever shifting environment. In short, they have all developed sense organs and motor functions in order to facilitate that ongoing transaction. Hence, we have eyes and ears and touch, as well as motor skills due to muscles and bones - and all of that being governed moment to moment by what we might call our conscious waking self, but as we will see to call this process a 'self' might be a bit of a misnomer, and a misconception of what this functioning actually is or how it works.

The most basic hierarchy we can see in all higher and more complicated organisms can be seen in the process of evolution itself, as different structures evolved so as to surpass but subsume previous adaptations. We went from very primitive hardware and software at the level of a fish or reptile, up to something more instinctive in nature, which is what we see in most typical animal brains. And finally we get the neocortex and the human brain, which is what we might call the thinking brain.

It is important to note this hierarchy, what you might call body, emotion, and mind, and that the process through which it developed was necessarily constrained by the purpose for which it all exists. In very simple terms, that the body grew the brain for its own purposes, and ultimately maintains control over it, in just the same way as any collective might elect leaders from amongst the group, but must maintain control over those leaders to make sure they govern things towards the best possible outcomes for everyone. Those 'leaders' are actually servants, not masters, and the same is true in our case - the brain is a servant, not a master. And this is important to know, if only because happiness does not actually happen in the brain. Like a truly great leader, the glory they bask in can always only come from the fulfilment of their purpose, which is to say - from the crowd. It comes from the bottom up, not the top down.

I mean, it is tempting to think that you are in charge of your body, but actually what you imagine yourself to be is just a servant, a series of processes moment to moment, being generated by a vast and seething unconscious, so as to merely produce in some sense the illusion of conscious continuity and executive power, but actually this deeper system maintains control at every point. Just try holding your breath for 10 minutes and you will soon see who's in charge.

So even here we see one important factor that people might often completely invert or misconstrue or fail to understand - which is that if ever you as the 'conscious waking self' wish to be happy then you certainly need to understand the framework within which you operate, and the systems to which you are subject. Which is to say - if you want to be happy, you really need to at least know what happiness is, and where it comes from.

Anyway, it seems unavoidable that we are going to need to address the basic realities of emotional states within this context, as we see them expressed in the way that our own anatomy functions. Whilst it might sound prosaic, everything we do is really just about directing energy toward the fulfilment of biological needs over time, in an ever shifting environment.

The foundation of this system, in our own case, is emotional attachment. We start off in infancy with all of our needs being fulfilled by caregivers, and over time gradually and successively assume responsibility for fulfilling those needs ourselves in a complicated world. Therefore, what we see at the beginning of life is a singular globalised attachment bond to the primary caregiver, and that over time this will be split up and moved around according to a certain pattern of incremental development.

The key thing is that an attachment bond is a kind of functional shorthand, a shortcut, and that it always actually represents some underlying need fulfilment. In our case, because we start off in a state of complete dependency, this globalised attachment for the primary caregiver is singular like a cake, but that it is then progressively sliced up and moved first to other people and then to other objects or transactional relationships in the world. In many cases it is ultimately shifted towards functions that exist within yourself, rather than out in the world. My little boy will sit on the toilet and scream for someone to come and wipe his bum, but my little girl - a little older - does not bother with all of that. She just does it herself, and saves herself all of that trouble and stress.

As I say, the basic purpose of emotional attachment is to direct the flow of energy and action towards the continuing and ongoing maintenance of fulfillment for need and desire. Actually, need and desire cannot really be seen as separate things at all, in that they are - correctly speaking - merely the same thing expressed at two different levels. And here we see the central transactional basis of most of what we experience emotionally, which is generally captured in psychological theory under the heading of 'object relations'.

Once again, this might seem particularly mundane, but there really isn't much need to reach for complicated explanations for things that can be explained in far simpler ways. As you will see later, we will be adding a great deal of complexity in due course as we come to examine how all of this simplicity has been screwed up so badly.

In the meantime, and in very simple terms, what this means is that in just the same way as we originally formed an attachment bond to a primary caregiver, and as a result achieve the fulfillment of our needs over time, in just the same way we syphon off that attachment over time to functions that we develop, and transactions that we formulate in the world, and then attach to those transactions as a kind of shorthand for the need fulfilment underlying the surface level exchange.

Which is to say - we often don't necessarily understand, or need to understand, the reason for attachment in any particular instance. Not at a conscious level. We simply maintain and foster the transaction itself, and everything else takes care of itself, which is kind of the point. Attachment means: this = that. It is a kind of short circuit. A short arc between two otherwise distant points.

The key thing is that many people are not really consciously aware of this connection in any salient way, they function unconsciously for the most part, simply following what they feel at any moment - they love what they tend to love, hate what they tend to hate, fear what they tend to fear, and things seem to work out in terms of need fulfilment over time. Which is precisely how the system has evolved to function. The conscious self generally doesn't need to know all the underlying details.

This is how attachment functions so as to simplify our transactional landscape. For the most part you don't need to know how the system works unless something goes wrong with it. It is a kind of automatic management system, an autopilot in a sense - you just let it run and follow what you feel, and your feelings should take you home. It is a beautiful system, and in a fair world this is how things would work.

In our case, however, something has occurred to screw this functioning up, but we will get to that later on. For now we need to see how all of this should work if it was working correctly.

As indicated, the most elementary factors that make this system operate in a healthy way are the functions that establish and maintain emotional attachment, and the way those anchors then act to direct energy and change over time. In simple terms you might imagine that the conscious waking self exists within a kind of emotional architecture, like a house or village that has been constructed so as to determine a certain pattern of healthy tendency in the occupants over time, and that there are other deeper functions that act more like the builders and architects of that shifting landscape.

In this case, however, all of this construction needs to be maintained on a somewhat more fluid basis, adapting to change not only very gradually, but sometimes even moment to moment to fit a rapidly shifting circumstance. And you can see various levels of depth in this process of adaptation, in response to various levels of threat or change.

So think about this: what if you had an attachment to something in your life that you didn't want to lose, but let's say it was lost, or stolen, or in some sense taken from you. And let's say this transaction represented some sort of underlying fulfillment in relation to your biological system, some need or transaction you required in order to maintain stable equilibrium as an organism.

What would the next thing be that happened in that case? What would your options be, if maintaining that degree of need fulfillment was a necessary part of your life as a whole?

There would really only be two options in that case: the first being to recover the transaction or object, and to thereby maintain the attachment and the need fulfillment underlying it. Or in the other case to relinquish that particular surface level object or transaction, and to set about the process of establishing a new one and its place.

The third and only other option available in the situation would be if neither of these two were available, and where need fulfillment thereby came to be thwarted for a period of time, or even permanently.

So what would each of these look like in emotional terms?

The first one, representing the shallowest of all of these options, we would generally call anger - give my shit back etc. It is the protection of an existing attachment bond.

The second is a deeper process wherein the needs associated with any attachment event must be separated from a particular surface level fulfillment structure, in order to recover that core element and load it back into your system as an operational tension that will then seek to unwind itself over time in the form of the establishment of a new surface structure. And that 'tearing away' process is what we might call grief. This is why grief is more painful than anger, it is because it is the loading up of tension that must then be fulfilled. This is why grief is not a happy state. It is because it is the opposite of happiness. It is literally the generation of temporary unhappiness designed to drive the conscious waking self crazy until it acts to fulfill the needs of the organism, of which it is a servant, not a master.

Therefore, the function of grief is to generate desire, which is a loaded tension expressly designed to make you uncomfortable until it is fulfilled and once again released, which is why in the Oxford dictionary the definition of happiness is 'the fulfilment of desire'.

The third of the three functional options, where neither of these first two are available, is what we would call fear. In functional terms, fear is essentially just a deadlock or a locking up of the other two functions, a temporary and very high tension state that has no ultimate function except to drive energy down one or other of the other two paths by any means possible, and thereby maintain need fulfillment in an ongoing way. And in some sense you could say that fear is not actually an emotion, in that it generally has no directionality to it. Like emotional constipation, there might be a lot of pushing, but in the end nothing actually moves.

The point being, by the time something does actually move, the state is no longer fear. But for as long as no avenue to exit remains available, tension (fear) will continue to rise, because a lack of fulfillment for need - especially primary need - simply cannot be tolerated.

So all in all we see a hierarchy of emotional tension here, from slight, to medium, to heavy, and all relating to underlying need fulfillment in the organism as a whole. It is all geared towards the maintenance of ongoing need fulfillment over time, the achievement of which should result in positive emotional states at every stage as experienced by the frontal conscious 'self'.

Of course this is all rather negatively oriented so far, but we can flip this whole thing upside down to see the same thing in positive terms. There is clearly a lot more to go into here, we are being very brief.

When you consider all of this from a more positive perspective you likewise see a series of integrated positive incentives being presented to the executive level (the waking self) as immediate emotional rewards. In particular, what we see in that regard is the primary currency of positive feeling states, an anchor for the 'conscious self' back into the subjective reality of organic existence, which we might simply call 'feeling'. In some sense this raw and blissful state of radiance - both deep and positive at the same time - is the positive carrot that goes with the negative whip of emotional stress. It is the positive end of the spectrum to which the other states are a negative distraction. In some sense you could say that the tensions we indicated above are a kind of ransoming of this positive feeling state - that the body will basically withdraw some aspect of this rewarding state if the mind does not maintain an ideal level of fulfillment over time. Or, viewed the other way around, this deep and blissful feeling state is like the 'bonus pay' the conscious level of experience might receive for a job well done.

So anyway, hopefully that makes some kind of sense as a foundation for how these systems operate. And hopefully you can see this in action in your own mind - that there is a certain equilibrium associated with it, a delicate balancing act, and for the most part that it operates beautifully.

We will often represent this balancing game as being like a ball in a bowl, with the low point in the middle being some kind of ideal transactional state, and the elevation of the sides of the bowl representing emotional stress. The ball is the conscious experience, the actor in a sense.

The point is that the entire system will always tend to return to a kind of fundamental equilibrium, a singular point of integrity around which all of this will function, and if you push that ball away from this point of integrity that it will be increasingly pressed up this hill. That hill represents stress, and that stress will tend to roll the ball back to that point again. So it is very stable over time, and equilibrating toward the ideal.

We see this same principle in all organic systems, where we call it homeostasis, and in our case it is just the same thing expressed in a higher and more refined form. So we might call that being happy today, or pissed off tomorrow, or tired or hungry or angry or sad the next day, but it is all just this same thing - it is all just this ball as it gets rolled around in this bowl. And more importantly, if you know where that point is, if you can grasp the underlying transaction the ball is always trying to reach, then you can essentially maintain emotional stability permanently, at least until you are shocked out of that state by some unforeseen event. This deeper awareness, with its more proactive approach, is what might be called maturity.

In the end, the key thing to see is that the nature and functioning of this whole system is beautiful in its elegant equilibrium - it is both simple in essence, as well as powerfully complex in application. And overall we see a system here, especially in our case, that should ideally result in fulfillment of need over time in an extremely reliable way, and therefore the achievement of some kind of summary bliss on an ongoing basis that is pretty much permanent. But clearly this is not what we actually see. So what the fuck is going on here? We clearly need to get a little deeper into the nature and functioning of the problem we are suffering from.

In order to get to the bottom of this we need to scope out just a little bit more anatomy, and foremost in that sense is the idea - or the reality - that the way we have come to function in relation to information processing, so as to be able to navigate the world we see, and the transactions we are charged with maintaining, or governing, has come to involve a very large degree of artificial simulation.

And this is going to be a little bit strange to think about, but hopefully it will make sense once you get your head around it a little, and stop to observe the way your own mind is working in this regard.

Change management, which is what all brains do, is all about predicting future outcomes and acting in the present moment so as to adjust what you might call the natural 'path of least resistance' toward action that is in many cases more difficult or costly in the present moment, but that has better future outcomes. Or it might not even be more difficult or costly, just more difficult to predict, but nevertheless have better future outcomes - resulting states that to any other organism, or through any other lens, might not be obvious. I mean, it is actually possible for you to take a slow walk down to your local store and circle 7 numbers on a piece of paper and end up with 20 million dollars as a result. It's just that you have no way to predict which 7 numbers, right?

So how do you assess your activities in the present moment so as to produce the best outcomes, how do you select from all of the options currently available to you? How do you even know what those future outcomes might be, or how your actions and the present might affect each?

For any typical animal this is impossible, if only because the future does not actually exist. And we can see the same thing looking backwards, and that the past also does not exist, except as some kind of echo in the present moment.

We are not speaking in ultimate terms here about the final nature of time of course - what it is or how it works, or whether it even exists. That is for cosmologists to figure out. But for the purposes of our brutally simplistic discussion here it is enough to say that it is definitely not what we tend to believe it is, based on the way we have come to process information about it.

From our own perspective, the point is that we have quite a strong sense of time - including both past and future - when in fact from our own direct experiential point of view we have never encountered either. And this is quite easy to check if you bother to examine it. You only need to try to go there, to visit the past, or the future, even just for a moment. It is amazing how often we will imagine doing this, but have never actually done it. Nobody has, not ever, even once. Is that not strange? That all there is, that all time - including what we imagine to be the past and the future - exists only now?

This is very strange to think about, but in every meaningful sense there is actually only the present moment - a changing experiential reality that has always only existed right now. But this is clearly not what we tend to experience, right? But that is quite unique to us, which is what we are seeking to explain here. It is all about the way we have managed to navigate this underlying transaction and manage the flow of change so as to result in our best advantage.

So how can you - how can any animal - modify its behaviour so as to produce or choose or select different future outcomes, if those outcomes can never be known? Essentially, the only thing any organism can do is in some way record patterns in the flow of change and keep that information in the present in some sense, and then work to calculate or predict how those patterns might project forward into the structure of future change.

In very simple organisms we see this in the form of conditioned response, or as genetically transmitted patterns of behaviour - impulses that have previously worked to produce more favorable outcomes, which is what we see in instinct, etc. But in our case we made a big leap in this regard, and this is what has given us such an advantage. Unfortunately, this leap in functional capacity has also caused us a great deal of trouble, in that it came packaged up with a kind of knot or conflict, an unforeseen bug, like a software update that came with a computer virus.

In our case what it meant was that we were able to combine a series of convergent capacities to produce what we might call 'imagination', which gave us the ability to fabricate an entire framework around our present experience. Suddenly we were able to construct backwards in time using memory, and from this foundation to begin to project forwards in time using probability, and also sideways in time so as to expand the present moment far beyond our own direct sensory perception. The result of which was an ability to thereby generate an entire experiential simulation within which our much smaller perceptual reality might be packaged, a vast artificial framework within which our much smaller real life transactional life is continually occurring.

This convergent ability has obviously been extremely advantageous to our species as a whole, and has allowed us to essentially take over the world, as well as to work together in ways that were not previously possible.

Of course, there are also lots of surrounding developments associated with all of this, such as language, and the cultural transmission of knowledge, and so forth. All of which helped us to further populate and generate this vast construction in our own heads. But the key thing to understand about all of this is that none of it would be of any value whatsoever if we did not respond to that artificial mental construction as if it was reality itself, and that by far the simplest way to gain all of the advantages associated with such a costly activity was to simply not inform the conscious waking level of experience that this was even being done. We have no more certain process by which to assess what might really be going on than this contrived architecture. The brain has no higher authority to appeal to other than its own 'best guess' at any moment, and so we have to submit completely to the only information that we have until something better comes along. And nothing better has come along yet.

So it is worth understanding that a great deal of what you feel to be reality, what you feel to be your life, and what you experience emotionally - even cosmologically as the nature of reality, and as the nature of yourself - is being generated as part of what we might call 'secondary' or 'simulated' reality, rather than being 'primary' or 'directly experienced' reality.

And you might say - so what? What's the problem with that? And no, there would be no problem with that, not if our construction of 'simulated reality' was accurate and balanced, but actually certain unforeseen events occurred alongside the implementation of this operating system, and these errors - along with the fact that we have not really been informed by evolution about the illusory and tentative nature of this entire development - have caused the very profound issue we are now suffering from as a result.

In particular you need to think about what the worst possible mistake could be if there was an error in the way this system came to formulate this moment to moment 'construction of reality'. After all, some of the most important aspects of universal reality might end up being the most difficult aspects to figure out with any certainty, so we can only guess in that regard. And if we are essentially just 'making it all up' based on our best possible guesses, then what might we have guessed wrong that could have the most terrible possible consequences for us over time?

And here we see the big issue - we don't even know what the universe is, or who we ourselves really are within that context. Some of the most important aspects of our direct experience remain complete mysteries to us. But one aspect of our experience seems to remain constant, and also remains a focus of our attention at every moment.

The world we generate for ourselves through time - through history, and through the future, and even in the expanded present - requires a historical self, a present self, and a future self. The entire construction is oriented around probabilities that relate to our 'self' over time, which is in fact correct. All of this activity has indeed evolved to serve the purposes of the base organism which supports it, so it is obvious that the concerns of that organism will be of paramount consideration in all instances. And so, in order to get this whole 'navigation engine' to work effectively to best modify behaviour so as to select for better future outcomes for the organism, we really do need to project our 'future self' into time, and to 'feel what that future self feels' in a sense, and that calculation is generally based on what our so-called 'past self' has felt. And so, we 'remember' past feelings, and then we 'project' those feelings into the future as an array of different scenarios - and then continually present those different possibilities to our present conscious mind as if to offer it a bunch of different 'future selves' relating to different 'futures scenarios', each connected to different present actions. And this is how the very simple organism, which ultimately holds all the emotional leverage, is convinced to sacrifice in the present moment for future gains. It is a lot like training a horse to do tricks in this sense, and this is why the ability to sacrifice in the present for future gain varies so much between people - it is a relationship you need to foster, and a trust you need to build, based on your predictions being accurate, as well as reliably fulfilling. But people who repeatedly make bad predictions, or who ask too much, too often, and for too little gain, will invariably lose all ability to access what might be called 'willpower'.

We thereby motivate ourselves to choose actions in the present moment so as to hopefully live into the projected future we desire, whichever one was chosen from amongst all those available in our perception of the future options we were able to reliably predict.

Hopefully that makes some kind of sense. Can you see this? Does it all basically fit? Or, more importantly, can you see any other way that it might be working? Can any of this even be questioned so far, based on what you know about yourself, and about life, and the universe as a whole?

The point being, however, is that if you look at the reality of the system and its origins, and the nature of life itself in the universe, you will find that there is no 'self' associated with any of this. Like the way we perceive time, the entire concept of 'self' is once again an artifact of the way we have come to process information. The whole idea of 'self' is, in some very real sense, just a functional illusion rather than a self-existing event or entity.

And this is going to seem very strange of course, but yes, it literally means that you - as you think you are - do not actually exist. Of course, this is the one summary lesson we see echoed throughout time by all the great sages, but we tend to dismiss it as metaphorical or spiritual, rather than being what it is - a mere statement of literal fact.

So why would this be a problem? There are obviously great advantages to this 'projection of self', to fully embodying the 'reality of the future self' in the present moment. There have to be great survival advantages for the organism in being so fully devoted to its own prosperity and wellbeing. And yes, there are. But the problem we encounter in this whole extended picture of reality, and the whole projected conception of 'self through time', is death. It is all about the way inevitable personal death represents a summary thwart of all organic need, and the way that future termination point washes back through time like a tsunami of perpetual and rising fear into the present moment.

The imminent and very pressing reality of personal death animates and amplifies a spiral that starts out as quite a normal and balanced process of need fulfillment in the beginning, but one that eventually becomes fixated and amplified to an exponentially infinite degree. Once the motivational system discovers this big juicy bone out in the far future, and begins to seek ways of navigating its way around that terminal point, it ultimately finds no answer - and so it begins to dig and dig and dig, ultimately resulting in the highest valence emotional tension: what we might call 'existential fear', which is the highest possible emotional tension available within the bounded space of this system.

Existential fear is an emotional tension of such high force that it immediately produces a kind of functional deadlock - it immediately prevents all other polarities from registering, and thereby locks up all functioning, so that eventually there is no other option other than to somehow control or disassemble the processes which are producing this roaring event.

We first see this crisis arising in childhood, with the emergence of nightmares etc, as the various functions associated first come on line. The child is left to wonder about this one great problem they have stumbled upon, and why the adults around them aren't so worried. Ah but they are, and this is what the child doesn't realise, if only because of how much personal bullshit their parents are swimming in, and how dishonest they are, even to themselves. The parents are themselves very worried about all of this actually, and the only problem with the child is that they have not yet learned all the various flavours of avoidance and denial their parents are so frantically adopting in order to suffocate and suppress this most pressing personal reality.

But the unfortunate thing about all of this is that death is quite real, and also that all of the functioning associated with trying to solve this problem is healthy, and so the only options available to control this event - and to put life back on track - is a combination of things which are necessarily subversive and dysfunctional in nature.

Essentially, the only thing that can be done is to some degree either eliminate, avoid, deny, or suppress the awareness of death itself - giving rise to all manner of 'functional pathology'. Or otherwise, in some sense to somehow fulfil the need to exist beyond death - giving rise to some kind of 'quest for immortality'. Either way, the key thing is to avoid the functional deadlock associated with full blown existential dread, and because all of the functions out of which that dread arises are healthy and normal, this means that the only available options are by subverting the behaviors and activities that together produce this operating crisis. We are essentially forced to attack ourselves. It is like not being able to quite reach the wolf that has hold of your leg, so you face a choice between no life at all, and life without one leg. So you cut your own leg off.

This is obviously a pretty grim metaphor, but in some ways it is worse than that, because whilst we are not speaking about physical limbs in this instance, the reality of our true situation is in some ways even worse, in that in our case all of this remains present and active in every moment, and because every day brings the wolf of death closer.

And let's be clear - there is no good way to do this. Every different path in this situation will cost you something. Some of them will cost you a lot. And there are many ways to achieve it. You might dig one big hole to bury it in, or you might choose a hundred small holes to produce the same effect, but the net result will be the same - you will not be happy. Not ever. Not really. Not in the way you were born to biologically expect.

Unfortunately the very nature of this event, just like the entire construction of secondary reality, is that it is not being made conscious. The frontal self is not informed of this entire repressive event. It is simply taken down from awareness, which is the entire point of it.

To relentlessly banish natural awareness is then the very purpose of the newly emerging functional agenda associated with the containment of this ongoing crisis. That containment must then be permanently upheld. The activity itself could have many forms available, but no matter which ones are selected - ultimately it must be implemented in a way that prevents the conscious dogs of attention from ever digging this stinky bone up again.

As an aside - The functions associated with the maintenance of this repression, the 'containment tanks' so to speak, are a bit like buffers, like suspension on a car. They are essentially parts of our system that would otherwise be available as modes of compression that would assist us in the creation of powerful outcomes. They are the functions that will allow us to temporarily compress, suppress, and delay - all of which are often necessary as part of any significant process of outcome oriented activity. There is no gain without pain etc, and sometimes you need to be able to hold your breath in order to swim under a log. But in this instance these buffers become consumed with this baggage, it is all containing and managing an event that is fundamentally illusory, but extremely serious nevertheless, and at the highest level emotionally. Curiously, however, the suspension and negation of all the motivational processes associated has no effect whatsoever on need fulfilment outcomes, if only because the needs associated are not actually real. But the act of suppression is very real, and will have a deep and lasting effect on our physical and emotional and mental wellbeing if it is maintained over time.

Which is to say - if we repressed or denied functions that related to our need to breathe oxygen we would obviously die very quickly. But if we repress functions that relate to our need to survive death we suffer no consequences whatsoever in a downstream sense, if only because surviving death is not a need any organism has. All organisms that are born will die, it is the only certain fact.

And so, as a very basic outline, this is the foundation of the situation we find ourselves in, which is why it is both dynamic and complex and very stable at the same time, but most of all completely invisible to us.

This is the great human secret. It is the one thing we all know, but also don't know, at the same time. Even when we are confronted with it in this way, we already know that we already know it, but we don't like to know that we already know. If that makes sense. It is like a secret that we are keeping from ourselves, so whenever anyone else comes along to point this out it is always a bit like getting accidentally involved in an argument between two other people, and having both of them suddenly turn on you.

It is, by definition, the one thing we don't know about what's going on in our own life, and the one thing that will always produce behaviour that is completely mysterious to our conscious waking self, especially when we look at our tendencies in relation to what might seem like obvious relational imperatives in the world around us. We seem to behave in very particular and peculiar ways over time, and for the most part all of that weirdness remains completely mysterious to us. It does not conform to a pattern that is known, and certainly not one that is ever openly discussed.

And this is why we can't figure out what we want. It is not because we are not playing the game properly - it is because the game is broken. It is because our emotional compass is spinning. The landscape has been corrupted so that up is no longer up, down is no longer down, but that there is some strange and confusing knot at the core of our emotional being. Because it is all occurring upstream from conscious experience, it means that we are always looking from this pattern of confusion, rather than at it, as indicated. So whilst we don't know what we do want much of the time, we nevertheless often find ourselves doing things that we don't want, and unable to stop ourselves from doing those things, even when we know this. It is all being driven by forces within ourselves, very powerful forces that are for the most part enigmatic, and that often change over time in ways that make no obvious sense at all. But actually it does make sense once you see what is really going on. It makes exact sense, and can even be predicted with great accuracy if you see the full anatomy associated.

This is the main thing to know - there are two fundamental agendas driving all behaviour at a conscious level. There is the primary agenda, what you might call the 'natural agenda' as defined by the structure of our organism itself in light of evolution over time, in relation to whatever environment we find ourselves in. And that system will produce a certain kind of ideal behavioral tendency over time, a very predictable pattern, especially once you take into account all the variables associated.

And then there is this secondary agenda, what you might call the 'subversive agenda', that is continually working to subvert and misdirect and suppress certain mechanisms associated with all of that healthy functioning, so as to maintain an outcome state that is completely mysterious to the conscious waking self - precisely because maintaining concealment at a conscious level is the very purpose of that subversive agenda. So it is not only that we don't know what is really going on, it is that not knowing is precisely the function of this other agenda.

This is the great secret, as I say, and the final key to human life. There are actually two things going on within us, both below the level of conscious awareness. And one of them is not actually natural.

Curiously, whilst this might all be quite easy to see from the outside - like looking at a computer and knowing that it has some kind of virus - that would be the one thing the computer itself could never see, precisely because that's what a computer having a virus means. If the computer itself could see it, or in some way get hold of it, it would not be a computer virus. And in our case we see this even more explicitly, in that the very purpose of the added emotional agenda is to keep itself - and whatever it is hiding - away from conscious awareness.

It is a perfect trap in a sense, a self enclosed illusion. And the result at the end of the day - due to all the various forms it might take unavoidably representing some sort of cost emotionally or physically - is a very stable limitation on feeling and happiness, along with a profound degree of overall existential disorientation.

Does it make sense at all? Can you see the implications? Can you see how much it might explain?

Just this quite simple structure explains almost everything. It explains all the inner turmoil and confusion, and it explains all of the external conflict. It explains all the crazy shit that people tend to believe, and also why they tend to believe it so strongly. It isn't necessarily because what they believe has any basis in fact, but more often that something will be believed precisely because it isn't true - because it functions to violate rational thinking in a way that helps someone achieve a perpetual distortion of reality. It explains how all current paths lead nowhere, except and circles. And it explains how the only actual path to freedom is not being travelled by anyone. And the reason for this is because the problem for which that path is the summary solution is not something people are even aware they are suffering from, which is of course the very nature of the disease itself.

With this as a foundation, we can now begin to examine a few of the surrounding realities, and some of the downstream implications. There is obviously a lot more to this picture than we have managed to scope out in this very cursory sketch, but several things seem important to know.

The first thing to understand is the way all of this internal struggle and confusion is then expressed outwardly into the collective in the form of common culture, which - along with our tendency to believe all manner of strange and manufactured garbage - produces a far more institutionalised version of the same basic blindness, along with endless culturally reinforced delusions, such as religion, and the woke movement. The general erosion of healthy cognitive functions in the typical individual - as driven by the self destructive unconscious forces of this secondary agenda in its flight from terror - allows a kind of seedbed in which all manner of erroneous weeds tend to take root and flourish. And this pandemic denial of anything truly deep in culture likewise supports such avoidance in the individual. Shallow people seek out shallow environments, and as a result of this affliction being pretty much universally present in all people at this time in history we have ended up living in a very shallow world.

As I say, there is clearly a lot more to all of this, a great deal of important anatomical detail, but essentially that captures the core situation. Once this basic internal conflict is reflected outwardly into the collective, the same basic function of perpetual concealment becomes de rigueur so to speak - this 'turning away', both internally as well as socially, comes to be seen as natural and necessary in order to be 'civilised' in any commonly acceptable sense. And this is how common culture, by seeming to make things better for the individual, actually makes things worse by making people more comfortable within the trap, thereby entrenching the whole bind even further, and perhaps even making it permanent. Whether or not that ends up being the case may even be something you yourself will personally get to determine. But we will get to that.

This brings us to the other important thing to see about the picture here - which is that the issue being indicated can actually be undone. After all, the anatomy defines that added event as not being intrinsic or necessary, which means that the entire thing could potentially be collapsed and relinquished, at least hypothetically. And not only partially, or in some kind of transient way, but singularly and completely, as a whole. If this entire thing has essentially come out of nothing, out of what is basically an illusion, then why not just pack the entire thing up and send it all back to nothing? If it has arisen as a singular event, then why not remove it in an equally singular and unequivocal manner? And this is where we see the really big deal here.

So what would that mean, and how might it work? Is that even possible? What would it look like? Could it be that we have even seen that possibility in a few people over time? Sure, and I think we have. Once you examine the full and detailed anatomy of the situation, the possibility of resolving this issue becomes quite obvious, but along the way we also get to see what might make that radical potential extremely challenging for any typical individual.

In particular, what we see is a process that would - especially during the transition stages - be subjectively very scary and therefore difficult to sustain as a forward moving event.

With this in mind the central theme of all discussions regarding this insight will always come back to the way the resulting situation defines two stable equilibriums for any individual (2EQ) and as an extension of that two stable equilibriums for the world as a whole. And in this regard we need to introduce the terms - equilibrium, threshold, and cascade.

At the individual level, the stability of the current conflicted situation defines a sort of enclosed trap that can be very dynamic in the way it is expressed, but that almost never spontaneously resolves overall, not on its own. And this is what we mean by the term equilibrium - it is a dynamically stable state that will always return back to a certain point of balance, or in this case stable imbalance. However, what we also see is that this state in our case is not ultimately natural or necessary, and that with just the right intervention the entire added event can fall away, leaving in its wake a completely different point of integrity around which the whole system will then function, and to which it will tend to return. So in a sense we see two stable states - the diseased version, and the healed version so to speak. Two stable equilibriums.

There is basically a threshold implied, like a ball being pushed up a hill and over the top, where it will then roll away freely on the other side - but for most people that ball will never reach the top before they relent, and it will simply roll backwards again. They will generally end up right back where they started, and this is what we mean when we speak about the stability of the common state.

But once again we see the power of the collective here, and the way culture might support such a process, especially once all of the associated anatomy has been fathomed and institutionalised in some way, thereby providing meaningful assistance during this heavily fear ridden transition stage.

Very often we will represent these two states as being like two bowls, with behavioural tendency over time being represented by a small ball that is rolling around within this dynamic emotional territory. So that if the ball happens to be in one bowl, then it will tend to always remain in that bowl, and the conscious level of life may not ever know the other bowl even exists as a potential. But then, if events happen to somehow push that ball up and over the rim and into the other bowl, it will then tend to remain permanently in that new bowl, and always tend to return to the new point of equilibrium defined. And once again, in this metaphor we see the meaning of the term threshold - that being the peak of tension that separates these two different functional states.

This is a very profound insight in this instance, given the location and nature of the bind in our own case, so it is worth stopping here just to make sure it isn't overlooked as being trivial or mundane. From the perspective of the conscious waking self this possibility of there being an entirely different equilibrium really is difficult to convey, in that such a state (or what that might feel like) would by definition be completely beyond its grasp to imagine. This very ability to imagine such is precisely what has been eliminated in this sorry state. But what it literally implies is that there is a particular hidden line in your own internal territory that, if crossed, would immediately result in a new permanent state of being, a different emotional foundation for life as a whole, and that with every movement beyond that point this new state would become more entrenched and established. At that moment - like passing through an otherwise invisible doorway - you would essentially have exited your current state and entered an entirely new one.

There are two things we can see in this picture, two important realities that are worth taking into account as all of this begins to come into view for the first time -

- First of all that this threshold does in fact exist, and that if you move in that direction long enough, and don't stop, that eventually you will cross it - and at that point forward movement will become automatically established as the new default. An entirely new foundation for life will have been found, one that somehow mysteriously aligns what feels good with what is good for you.
- Beyond this, the other most obvious thing to know is that none of this is obvious at all. There is first of all nothing to tell us that this threshold even exists, and also no normal series of moves you might ever make in life that will result in that being reached. Not under normal circumstances. You might remain in that common equilibrium forever and never find your way out of it, or even suspect the existence of such an exit. And even if you did manage to accidentally discover this astonishing release, without any awareness of all the underlying anatomy that accounts for such a dramatic potential, you would then have a great deal of trouble explaining it, and as a result would also have no reliable way to repeat that event in other people.

The main thing to grasp here is not so much how much difficulty most people might have in seeing the nature or existence of this underlying issue within themselves, but most especially in being able to truly grapple with the far broader possibility of being able to resolve this conflicted event in all people. At that point, as if things weren't already heavy enough, the whole thing just gets ripped right out of their philosophical grasp, so to speak. It really is an epic possibility, literally a potential big enough and deep enough and wide enough to redefine our entire civilization. We would only need to unlock this concealed and latent potential in every individual and we would suddenly be having a completely different experience of life inwardly, as well as living in a completely different world outwardly.

•

So if we snap our view out to the collective now as we did to examine the way culture has tended to support and reinforce this avoidance in the individual, we once again see the same sort of connection to how all of this might be resolved. We not only see the very dramatic nature of the sociological wave that this individual resolution will generate at a collective level the moment it becomes available in any sustainable way - how fast it might all occur etc - but also the role that collective development will play. In that regard, we also get to see where it is presently stuck, and how little it might take now that we have this missing anatomy emerging here at last.

In our own case, both individually as well as collectively, this bowl metaphor can be extended slightly so as to include one more important detail or extrapolation. Due to the nature of the situation we are caught up in, and the way it is grounded in an illusion of sorts, as well as rooted in a maintenance of a very particular body of unawareness, it means that the common state (the second conflicted equilibrium) is somewhat fragile ultimately. Once it collapses in the individual it cannot then ever be reinstated, and at a collective level we see something similar. And what this means, generally speaking, is that it is always a one way trip. Nobody ever goes from the natural equilibrium back over into the conflicted one, if only because the most fundamental illusion at its root has then been exposed and transcended. Even if it was possible, such a journey would require considerable impetus, like seeking to push an avalanche back up a hill, and that sort of motivation simply doesn't arise in the natural state.

Ultimately, the entire trap is based on the continued presence of a certain fundamental lack of awareness, almost as if a secret is being withheld, and so once that secret is known it really can't ever again be unknown. And the same thing is true at the more collective level of culture, like what the Wright Brothers did - the moment those pictures appeared on the front of newspapers all over the world, the entire trajectory of aviation was indelibly set in the collective imagination of humanity from that time forward. There was then no putting that cat back into the bag.

And the same is true here - the only reason this potential is not a very serious subject of debate and development at the highest levels is not because anyone thinks it is unimportant. It is, as we have indicated, merely because they don't even know it exists. Just as flying was in the mind of the average person prior to Kittyhawk, people don't sit around thinking about it if only because it is not considered a realistic possibility, even conceptually. But the moment a single repeatable demonstration offered proof, suddenly everyone was thinking about it, and would never have stopped thinking about it until at least a few people made it an accessible reality for them. And so it will be here, which is what I mean when I say the current trapped situation is fragile.

So what do we mean when we speak about cascades? We can see this much more clearly once we transpose all of it into the collective, so as to examine how this individual potential might express itself at that level.

In general we can see that the common state (individual), along with common culture as its support (collective), is teetering in a kind of negative equilibrium, a bit like dropping a cigarette and having it stand up on its end. It might be balanced in that state, but not in any truly natural or stable way. And in our case the entire thing depends most fundamentally on the permanent absence of a certain body of critical awareness, the whole thing is a kind of manufactured trance that can quite easily be broken, as you can see here. Even as you read this sentence that spell is being broken, word by word, because whilst you may not have quite realised it yet - the information being provided to you here is the ultimate human secret, and you certainly won't find it anywhere else. As I said earlier. Which is true, right? You've definitely never heard this before, even though it might actually seem quite obvious once you know.

There is a great deal more detail, but even the broad outlines of what is being explained here are entirely absent at this time in history. And once again we see a kind of stability in this overall ignorance, in the way this critical body of information has been - and is being - so dramatically eroded away at every point. But this entire situation was always only ever going to be as stable as the masses are compliant, and it was always only going to take one 'bad kid' to step out of line, to reach out for a drink and bring the entire stack of champagne glasses tumbling down.

Therefore, the common state is stable in a sense, but only in the sense that a glasshouse is stable - until someone starts throwing stones. And in our case what it means is that once it begins to collapse, that the entire thing will quite quickly enter a state of imminent demise. The whole thing is a proverbial house of cards in this sense.

So once again we see the two bowls analogy working here in a different sense, with a critical threshold being represented at the collective level also, and that once this threshold is reached the whole thing will revert back to the natural state before too long. And in the case of the collective, what we see is a cascading collapse, something like a landslide event, where a great deal of pent up energy is released so as to drive a very deep process of personal change that will sweep through the collective like a tsunami.

In particular, and literally speaking, what this means is that the individual transition to freedom - the release from this cruel internal bind - will be made increasingly available to the average person, eventually reaching a point where that potential becomes commonplace, even mundane. And what this means, due to the very extreme nature of that possibility, is that everyone will eventually opt to embark on that brief transformational journey sooner or later. It will be an overwhelming proposition.

Therefore, what we see here is the individual transition from one equilibrium to the other - the permanent resolution of this concealed inner conflict - being beyond the reach of any person unless they have some kind of help. So where will that help come from? Only the collective has the power to provide such contextual support on a reliable basis. But once again, the collective - in the form of common culture - is not aware that this entire event is even occurring, let alone how to facilitate its resolution. It once again remains trapped in a different kind of negative equilibrium. And so, we see yet another threshold here, where sufficient information, in just the right terms, delivered to just the right type of person, might begin a process of exploration and development that will eventually become established as a sustainable and forward moving cultural endeavour - and ultimately begin to deliver the sorts of practical support indicated. Once again, we see an equilibrium, a threshold, and a resulting cascade - all leading to a new equilibrium being established.

We see here the possibility of a shift from a global culture that is completely devoid of even the barest awareness that this entire event is even going on, to a global culture that at least contains one small pocket of advancing insight, where enough of the critical anatomy has already emerged at the level necessary to orient and inform such a process. In a room full of sleeping people, only a single person needs to be awake in order to notice that the house is on fire, and all the rest will very soon follow. Of course, the house actually needs to be on fire so to speak, but that will be for you to decide based on how all of this stacks up against your own experience. I mean, does all of this seem like it might actually be right? Perhaps even quite obvious? But who could you talk to about any of this, if you wanted to delve a little deeper and take a look around? What maps might you use to guide the way? And where might you find others who were interested in doing that with you?

So we see a kind of journey upstream here, as we search out the triggering events that will set all of this in motion, and in that regard we see a kind of sequence - like branches, to kindling, to tinder. We have a 'personal realisation' threshold, a 'cultural awakening' threshold, and now a 'critical information' threshold. And that is the part currently missing - the part we are doing here.

Essentially, the stability of the common state is due to common culture so deeply reflecting the same aversion in the individual, and thereby normalizing and enabling a kind of collective trance state. Common culture is like an agreement we have all unconsciously made with each other so as to avoid ever speaking about this particular subject, a relentless and pervasive 'bullshit chant' that everyone is singing, and always very upset to be snapped out of. This can make people very grumpy indeed. It is a very stable and enclosed system for the most part, as we can see throughout all of recorded history.

This appears unavoidable. If this is true then it is implied that the summary solution to the single most pressing emotional issue every person has ever faced was apparently just sitting right in front of us, but that we had all agreed to not talk about it, if only because it always appeared too uncomfortable or scary.

Which is to say, the entirety of humanity - thus far - have been a bunch of spineless pussies.

Pardon my french!

In any case, maybe it's time for a new crew to take over? The entire situation is remarkably unstable in another sense, in that the individual potential for complete relinquishment exists by definition once you see the foundations of the entire event. And apparently just not being aware of this most basic anatomy is the only reason this potential is not already completely ubiquitous. It is all just because nobody was ever aware that it even existed. Until now. So how hard might it be now that all of this is coming to light in this way? And yes, it wouldn't be hard at all, if all people were equal. Alas.

To be clear, then: What I mean by 'loaded' is that a potential exists, right now, for a type of happiness you have never experienced, or at least not in your living memory, and that this potential might realistically be made available to you on the basis of even quite a moderate degree of collective development in that direction. And that once that development begins, it would be a freely self-sustaining process. And here we see the essential moral impetus in its purest form: Just how futile all of the current downstream solutions are in this context, if they don't take into account - and resolve in some way - this fundamental issue, which none of them do.

This is the other side of the coin here, and it is just as important to know. This is what generates the incredibly strong impetus associated at a moral level. It is all about seeing how much this singular solution stands to change, and how no other so-called answers have any chance whatsoever of achieving the same outcome. This cascading release is completely inimitable in this sense, which matters if only because the critical anatomy required is presently completely absent. As indicated, you will not find this anywhere, or in any form, not in the terms required to orient and inform that initial process of high level development and exploration. It is emerging here for the first time ever.

And this is itself rather absurd of course, and we will get to this below in more detail. But yes, the baseline implication here, and clearly a very hard pill to swallow, is that I solved the single biggest problem in your life - indeed the biggest problem in the world - without any help, in my spare time. And not just for you, but for every person on the planet. But as we will see, that does not make me great, it actually makes me lesser, at least temporarily. But as I say, we will get to that part below.

All of the damage associated has been due to the moral load, in the face of the very toxic social reality this body of critical awareness was always going to confront. Confronting people with the very thing they fear the most in life will not exactly make you the life of any party, but sometimes to make an omelette.. etc.

What matters is how this stacks up against stuff that people think is significant. This is the issue - what it all means is that 100% of people everywhere are currently headed down this same dead end street. All the so-called answers people have, what are they? That's all just dumb shit in the face of this emerging paradigm, and what it defines.

What does all of that possibly mean in the face of this particular underlying truth? Nothing, not really. They are all just futile and empty gestures, the whole lot, in that not one of them fathoms or includes the only truly important or critical thing to know - something without which all other solutions will ultimately fail to work. They are all downstream solutions to an upstream problem, and as such only tend to make things worse rather than better. At best they merely prolong the suffering, making us feel better about a situation that is ultimately untenable. Like making your prison cell more comfortable.

All of which is then juxtaposed with a potential that at the present time is completely unknown, but that stands to unequivocally resolve almost all of those issues in a single sweeping stroke, initiated by just a few people, and in a way that will be both impossible to stop once it is ignited, as well as resulting in an end state that is effortless to maintain.

Does that not explain the world we see today? It's all because we are completely unaware of what the true problem is, or how to solve it.

The two bowls express it all, once again. If any approach does not ultimately exit the common bowl, then it is just circular and futile junk. Which at this point in history is basically everything - all of it. And this explains the state of the world. All existing culture, in every different form, is just one more way to not talk about it, just one more expression of the problem, rather than being part of the solution.

Which is to say, all the really 'successful' people you know are hovering around the middle of the common bowl, and whilst they may be the least stressed as a result, they are also the most trapped of all. And yet, freedom is not just in 'any' direction away from that darkly conflicted point, it is in one very particular direction, and involves a very definite transition point along the way.

Working out this direction is the purpose of everything we are doing here, it is all about shining a light on an otherwise dark and invisible path, so as to be able to eventually navigate that difficult territory toward freedom for everyone.

The main point is that there is a way to completely resolve this upstream issue, and many different methods to assist in that event, as well as to understand it fully. There may not be any single way, a bit like how to solve a Rubik's cube, it is always a bit different depending on exactly how any particular cube was mixed up in each instance - but the final outcome state is the same for all cubes, and all the basic mechanisms can be understood. Assuming you are smart enough. But none of that is possible until you have this basic architecture in place, so as to begin to understand even the broad context of such a radical intervention.

In some ways this is a metaphor for the world we see today, it is like a situation where every different person has an emotional core that is a bit like a mixed up rubik's cube, each one different, and nobody anywhere knowing how to solve the puzzle. And then, some little kid will come along to show people how to do it, and suddenly the whole world is full of people who have the same simple colours on each side, and who also never again get themselves so mixed up. What was previously a society trapped in confused energetic divergence suddenly becomes a culture defined by clarity and natural alignment.

The only thing that matters is that the potential exists, and that it is possible, perhaps even quite easily possible with enough contextual understanding. We will probably look back one day and wonder how something so easy and obvious had so profoundly eluded us for so long. Like a stick of dynamite, the world we see today is a situation that is both extremely stable and unstable at the same time, depending on how you view it.

But here is the caveat - as an individual pursuit you stand no chance. Not without a match to light the very particular fuse in this instance, and that is only something that the collective will be able to make available to the individual. Like flying once again - it is easy as a group endeavor, like so many important things, but really not something you might whip up on your own.

So there you go. Doesn't this make sense of the world, and of your own experience of life? This is the thing you come to see once the detailed anatomy is understood. When you lay that over what you see, it exactly fits the previously mysterious pattern. The enigma is completely solved.

It's not messy at all, and makes perfect sense. It can also be predicted with great accuracy. All of which is a huge relief in itself, just to see what is really going on is a profound event for many, like finally being able to scratch some terrible itch.

But it is this other end state that makes the big noise here, this pending practical release, especially once you begin to truly appreciate the depth and scale of the conflict in every person, and just how profound an experience any release of that issue might be. The theory might be interesting for philosophers, but for all the rest it will be the applications that have the big impact, and in this instance the whole point of those will be that no theoretical understanding will be required. You will simply be changed, profoundly and permanently released somehow, right at the very core of your being, and you won't even need to know how.

A conflict at the root of your emotional core is a fundamental bind, it cannot even be seen by the conscious waking level, let alone resolved. Not normally. But that's what stands to change here now that this anatomy is coming to light in this way. Suddenly we have a mirror emerging here that is able to expose this crucial missing piece - the bit all common mirrors intentionally avoid showing us.

It is a very big deal. So big that most people can't grasp it at first. Even I can't really grapple with it easily. I have to abstract it like I am playing a video game, even in order to just write about it in this way. To approach this degree of ethical force in its raw and naked form would produce so much force that it would tear the flesh from my bones, morally and intellectually speaking. It is just so dramatic that it boggles the mind. So whenever I am speaking directly to anyone who is actually understanding what is being indicated, it is always a rather interesting experience. We recently discovered the ability to achieve that threshold in direct conversation, and the first couple of times it worked I literally ended up in hospital as a result, with acute adrenal and hypertensive shock. So for me, because I already understand everything that is at stake here, and what it all means - especially at this point of transition - just sitting down to talk about it is a bit like being hit by a bus.

So anyway, when I say 'the single biggest problem in your life' you really don't have any idea what I'm talking about, right? But what I'm talking about is the single biggest problem in your life, the really deep problem, the really lasting problem, the problem so penetrating that you can't even talk about it with your closest friends or partner. I am talking about the problem you only ever visit when you are alone, the one you always imagined you were the only one who struggled with, the one you might commune with as you walk along a lonely beach in the rain. The dread that lies buried so deeply in your childhood nightmares that you only ever glimpse it fleetingly when all of your frantic dog paddling fails for a moment, and you accidentally sink back into it. I'm talking about the profound and bewildering pattern of struggle and confusion and pain and loss that has haunted your entire life from end to end - a pain so great, and so pervasive, that ultimately you will probably never fully fathom the scale of it until it is finally vanquished.

And even here we will see a kind of parting of the crowd, with some people saying - hell yeah, I know exactly what you are talking about! But then there will be a great many others who have absolutely no idea, and who definitely don't suffer from anything like that! Which of course they do, so the only thing we actually see there is a measure of basic honesty, and how some people not only hide all of this from others, but also from themselves.

This is the part that very few people are able to grasp about what I'm saying. It is not just about having found some kind of solution, or that it is not being offered in a manner that is clearly enough defined, even though both of those things might also be true. It is mostly about the fact that people are so profoundly dissociated from the problem in themselves - and in culture - that they can't recognize what we are even referring to here. It just comes up blank. They don't feel it at all. They are not open to the answer, because they are not open to the question. They don't even recognise what you are talking about. Plainly, the cure here only really means something if you have the disease, right? And most people don't even know, precisely because of the way the disease in this case works.

And yet, if they did suddenly see, if what was being referred to here was somehow clearly enough pointed to, they would then recognise it immediately. Oh no, not that..no no no, god no.. really?

They would immediately start to sob, they would break down and cry, both in grief at all the life lost, but also in open joy - joy that someone, somewhere, was able to see them at last, to truly fathom the depth of their private pain, and to maybe even do something about that - that someone may have finally got to the bottom of a problem so deep they have never been able to share it with anyone, or even really embrace it fully within themselves.

What does all of that mean? It means that this entire thing is coming out of the blue. Out of left field, so to speak. And yet, the true scale and drama of what is being proposed almost certainly won't have dawned on you yet.

Sometimes you just want to say it really simply, as if you are speaking to a child, and actually that might even be the level where people ultimately get stuck. It is a really big deal, and ultimately very complex in detail, but it is actually quite simple in essence. It is just invisible due to the concealment of the problem it solves, as well as being so overwhelmingly massive in its downstream implications that it just sort of bounces off any healthy and naturally sceptical mind.

So what would that look like? How to say all of this most simply?

- a) You are presently suffering from a profound and dynamic and completely invisible limitation on your ability to experience natural happiness, and in order to manage the resulting situation without too much emotional stress your own unconscious has essentially banished all recollection of what natural happiness is supposed to feel like. And this is why there is always some vague sensation of numbness or bluntness in life, like something is missing somehow, like licking an icecream covered in cling wrap, but when you look for the origin you really can't find anything obviously wrong. But actually that conflict is far wider and deeper and more profound than you may ever have suspected, and the degree of limitation associated is likewise far deeper than you might naturally assume. And yet, in a bent world a bent person will appear straight, and so it is that we are forever led away from the singular insight that might change everything, albeit a rather uncomfortable insight.
- b) Because this underlying conflict is not intrinsic, it is implied that it might be strategically released or undone, but only if that potential was made available to the individual somehow on the basis of at least some degree of collective development in that direction. To find this on your own might be possible, but without the essential anatomy to guide you that would be very difficult, and therefore only a path open to a rare and brave (or lucky) few. That possibility will never be scalable, especially in the absence of the deeper theory, and the very stable absence of that underlying map means that the collective development that might quite easily make that possibility accessible to everyone over time never has an opportunity to occur. Basically, nobody even knows this entire possibility exists, and so nobody is working on it, not in the only terms that matter in this instance.

- c) Once again, the particular information this requires would need to be sufficiently complete as well as couched in exactly the right terms in order to set the stage for that territory to open up fully, a bit like lighting a theoretical fire - you would need enough heat, in just the right spot, to create a cascading process of development. And the need for this critical anatomy is why there are certain groups who have been examining this same potential for perhaps thousands of years and yet still have not constructed a robust theory about it, and as a result failed to make it any more available, when actually both of those things are eminently possible. As we may soon see for ourselves here.
- d) This entire potential remains hidden from view not only because of the obvious internal avoidance in the individual, but also because of the way common culture has come to reflect this denial at such a pervasive level. And what this means is that there is no recorded cultural evidence of the essential anatomy required in order to map out the core of the possibility, and also that as anyone approaches this particular transition threshold within themselves that things will in general get worse and worse, right up until that point of release is achieved. And so it is that this combination, with its lack of orientation, leaves people unable to tell which direction to move. This cultural ineptitude, when combined with the very strong emotional tendency to always move away from this particular threshold, means that the entire potential paradoxically rests quite clearly within reach, but completely out of view. The very few people who have managed to find this release mechanism appear to have done so on a completely accidental basis, and as a result have never been able to reliably repeat that event in other people, if only because they don't really know what it is, or how it works. So for these people it is like becoming rich by winning the lotto, and then having people ask them - how did you do it? And yet the ashrams are all full of people seeking 'spiritual enlightenment', even though lotto tickets are all they actually sell.
- e) So at the end of the day the entire event has been trapped behind this wall of ignorance and denial, which has in turn functioned to prevent the critical anatomy coming to light, and thereby perpetually hobbled any attempt in the collective to solve all of the downstream issues associated - if only because they have not been able to identify the singular upstream cause. But now that we do seemingly have this anatomy coming to light here at last we are all left to confront this singular choice right at the start, which can pretty much be defined by whether or not you are prepared to merely take a closer look.

Basically, something is broken in the way we are processing the whole game. And this also explains why so many bad things make good money. It explains why the algorithm, when it is responding to human preference without moderation or guidance, will tend to send us all down the collective toilet. The issue is not with the algorithm, it is with the human emotive core being so deeply conflicted.

This explains both why we don't know what we want, why we often can't get it, and why - even if we do - we often don't enjoy it in the way we imagined. It is because the true issue we are facing cannot be accessed or confronted at that level of life. It is an upstream issue, but all we ever do is seek to manage it in a downstream way. For the most part we are not even aware that we are suffering from such a deep and confounding issue, let alone what suddenly being able to resolve all of that might feel like.

Does it not at least appear to be worthy of a closer inspection, just in case it does turn out to be correct? I mean, imagine the scale of the events being indicated, and how fast it could all happen. But you probably can't do that, right? Not yet? The implications of singularly and finally relinquishing this tortured anguish are not easy for most people to grasp. Not at first.

It's absolutely huge. Once you take this individual potential and begin to calculate that becoming available at a mass scale, along with all the information associated, it is most likely the biggest thing in human history. And it would only take a few to initiate the entire thing. And yet, nobody would ever find it. It is resting within reach, but nobody would ever see it. We could all roll around in that bowl forever and still it would remain completely out of view. It is completely secure.

But then, once it does come to light, as we see here, all of that changes immediately. Then, suddenly, beyond a certain critical mass - everyone will see it. And at that moment the entire thing will enter a state of collapse that will be unstoppable.

There are clearly a few issues here, and sooner or later we need to stand back and take stock of the whole thing. We need to come up for a breath, and see where all of this lands. There are some very big questions it asks, even as it potentially answers so many others.

Several things stand out as being particularly important, and they are sort of connected. First of all there is my own connection to all of this at the critical moment where the previously hidden information might finally be making its way out into the wild, so to speak. And then there is the curious issue of who I might be speaking to in that regard, and what being qualified for all of this actually means.

Step by step we have been following the sequence back now that we know that this threshold exists, and what's basically at stake, in order to see where we currently stand, and what needs to happen next. And once again, we find ourselves traveling upstream here, in order to identify the triggering events that stand to set that first small process in motion, which is where we stand now.

So what have we been able to calculate? When will we reach this tipping point? Have we already done that? And if not, is it inevitable at some point in the near future? What exactly defines that threshold within the current context here?

There are two basic possibilities here, as we have seen. There is the trapped state, and the free state. It's not that complicated. And when you follow it all back up that chain to see where the entire thing has been stuck for all this time, we can see that in every moment of time we are either in the old one, or we have successfully transitioned to the new.

So which one are we in? Are we already there now? Has this great fire of change already been lit in a way that will prevent it from ever being put out again, or is that something we can still expect to see some time in the future? Is the imminent collapse of this root of human suffering already underway, or not?

You really need to know this. And if we are not already there, right now, then you definitely need to know what reaching that threshold will demand, if only because your entire future - indeed the future of humanity as a whole - depends on this singular transition being reached.

So what is the answer? Have we already crossed this highest threshold here, or not?

No. At this point it is not yet inevitable. And you need to know this if only because I could die today, and if I did, then all of this would certainly die with me. The entire event.

Nobody would follow in my footsteps. You would only need to understand the history here in this regard, to see what I mean, which is something I might even share at some point, but needless to say it has been a very long journey.

This is the whole point here. Nobody will ever know more than I know, or be in a better position than I am in, not if they are starting from scratch like I did. So if I can't do it at this point, then really, it probably can't be done. Sure as hell you would never do that on your own, not in a million years. And I don't mean to be demeaning in any sense, but it is not only because of the particular skills associated, but that there seems to have been an astounding degree of chance involved. The final combination of factors that led to this emerging in my own case even right at the beginning was very unlikely, and that was only the start.

This is what drives my own impetus. This is precisely what defines the pending threshold. It is certainly not a fait accompli. Not yet. Not quite. A great deal of the necessary detailed information associated has yet to be passed over and recorded in any meaningful sense. Establishing a context where that might happen in some kind of sustainable way is precisely what needs to happen next here.

Which is to say - we need to find people who are both capable, as well as interested, and that conversation needs to begin. That's all.

We see a series of events here that link together so as to produce a situation where a very small event at the front end might ultimately result in a supermassive impact at the back end, which is of course how all cascades work. This is how a cigarette being thrown from a car window might result in a forest fire that wipes out millions of dollars of infrastructure and costs many lives. It is all because of how a spiraling cascade will tend to scale up very quickly, especially when there is a loaded potential, as we see in our own case. What we are talking about here is quite possibly the most dramatic single pent up force on the planet, at least socially speaking. People want this release more than they want anything else in their lives, but they are also profoundly afraid of the very thing that will need to be confronted in order for that to occur. So if we can find a way to overcome that fear, then very suddenly we will be in a completely different situation, and the floodgates will open. And there are lots of ways that this mitigation of fear might be achieved.

So what is the final threshold? That initial spark right at the apex here is simply the right information being delivered to the right people in the right terms.

And we don't have that? Apparently not. So how can we tell? We can tell because this awareness is not yet naturally propagating in any sense, and because there is nobody currently talking about it anywhere. There are already quite a few people who are keenly interested, and who have in some sense already been completely captured by the eclipsing moral imperatives associated, but somehow they still don't seem to talk to each other or engage with the whole thing in a way that would define them as being truly qualified for what comes next. All they ever want to do is speak to me about it, somehow without understanding that this is the problem now, rather than the solution.

So what do we mean by the term 'qualify'? What does that require? And why is it important? Well, let's just say that when you want to burn a house down, the one place you don't want to start the fire is in the fireplace. And that's what the average person is in this regard.

The combined function of this raging internal agenda, and the external pressure of common culture, produce a 'well adapted' individual that is very heavily insulated against the sort of cascading potential we would be seeking to initiate here in order to begin collectively penetrating this hidden potential.

Which is to say - the average person will be worthless here. Indeed, the typical person would probably be extremely toxic to any culture that was meaningfully exploring such territory in any open way.

This question of 'who qualifies' is actually deeply connected to my own personal involvement at this critical time, in that two things are happening here now that are new. The first is that I am rather tentatively making myself available to explain all of this to anyone who does appear to broadly qualify. And secondly, that we are intentionally adopting a far stricter stance in that regard, and targeting a far more qualified audience now, rather than stopping to continue engaging with people who clearly fall below the necessary threshold.

All of which, at this peak moment, comes together to produce a very unusual combination of factors. It really is a soup that contains some extreme highs and lows, and all of that is spiced with some of the hottest chillies on the planet, morally speaking. It really is an absurd situation in so many ways, but that doesn't mean it isn't still entirely true.

The important distinction we need to look at in this regard is the difference between being interested, and qualified. In other words - willingness vs ability, keenness vs capacity, desire vs competency, etc.

So does this mean that if you are basically understanding all of this that we have reached this critical threshold here? Maybe, but probably not. What that means is that you have at least taken the first turns correctly, and that in itself is rather rare. I would certainly not be speaking to you if this was not true. But there are many more turns to take here, and even if you have a will to take them, your own general abilities might not ultimately allow for that. You might simply run out of gas at some point, either practically, morally, or intellectually speaking.

This ability to both go all the way, as well as take every correct turn, is what we might call 'being qualified' in this context. And that's what we need to be targeting in this context, but very few people are. That certainly would make you very unusual.

This needs to be differentiated from what we might call the 'right stuff' in this context. So what is that?

To see this you really only need to take into account the nature of everything we have been defining above in relation to the various thresholds and the way they all cascade into each other like a series of increasingly bigger avalanches that start off with only a tiny slip of a foot. And from that, importantly, to notice that the current threshold at any moment in time is actually a moving target.

Which is to say, the total event, the full transition from one equilibrium to the other, for the world as a whole, necessarily involves a series of connected thresholds, all of which feed into each other in a kind of chain reaction, like a domino cascade or a viral pandemic.

So what is the 'right stuff'? That is simply defined by anyone who takes the right turn at every successive point, based on what they have to offer it. Being qualified, on the other hand, would be anyone who not only has the right stuff, but who also ultimately embodies the particular traits and abilities that would allow them to continue approaching each successive demand without moving beyond their abilities. The right stuff means you take the right turns for as far as you can go - being qualified means you have what it takes to go all the way.

So yes, it is very likely that you have the 'right stuff' in this context, but only your own future actions will define how qualified you are. But most likely we have only achieved the more elementary threshold of broad moral capture here, and that when it comes to 'the right information being delivered to the right people in the right terms' we are still falling somewhat short here. But yes, if you are basically understanding any of this, then we have probably already reached the first milestone here, which means that it is now only a matter of going deeper and finding the right person, and we will get to that below. That's probably not you, but maybe you know a guy, as they say.

This is why I will be taking the time here to so clearly define the right audience, it is because that is now the only thing we haven't tried here yet. We can easily catch a small fish now, as many as we wish in that regard. But is that really going to be a path worth going down? Do we even want all those small fish?

This is itself a question we need to ask here - what about the retail-public level? We appear to be approaching the point where all of this is about to take root at a wholesale-private level, where just a few very highly informed and intelligent people will get together to crack all of this open in a strictly private arena, which is the main deal here. The main event is practical not theoretical, and it will only take a small and dedicated few to do the heavy lifting in that regard, for everyone, and thereby deliver an application of some sort. But then we have all those who may still be extremely interested in all of this, even if they don't have quite so much to give it at the early stages.

What about them? What about the retail level so to speak, and all the value that might be offered merely by knowing this is possible, and seeing it coming? After all, those people often seem to find it deeply significant, even if they can't really help much. Should we just ignore that level of potential audience until the practical elements emerge? Or should we make all of this information public?

It is a question you yourself might be able to help me answer. I mean, whilst this may be interesting to you, you are probably not looking to change the entire world, right? Nor prepared for what that would demand from you as a result? And the very simplistic language we have been using here are also not the right terms. This is all just a very rough sketch, like a pencil drawing, rather than the detailed blueprints that development will require.

And yet, did you find any of this interesting at all? Do you basically understand any of it? Do you see the nature of what's going on, where it is stuck, and what's at stake? If so then we are probably well over that most basic moral threshold, where aversion suddenly shifts to interest, as we have now proven more than a few times.

So now we only need to decide if we need this level of engagement at all, before we move on to crossing the same threshold with a few who more fully qualify. But maybe we do. I mean, as I said in one of my other books, the man in the arena is nobody without the roar of the crowd. And maybe a bit of financial incentive is what the really big fish will require. Those people are already going to be very busy of course, and most likely quite successful. So spectators might still have a role here, provided they stay off the field, and don't get in the way.

Anyway, at this stage we have now managed to map out several of the important aspects that define this whole picture, so perhaps we could recap those here before we move on to the last big chunk.

- First of all there is the scale and depth of the great cascading event that lies in potential here, completely hidden from view. And in particular that this possibility represents the resolution of a problem that the average person does not even realise they are suffering from, and of which common culture has not made them even slightly aware, which means the entire thing will be coming out of the blue for them. So when it begins, it will simply arise like a burgeoning wave, seemingly out of nothing, and sweep through culture in an irresistible manner, like Noah's mythical flood - except in this case only washing away suffering and struggle. And this part really is far too dramatic for most people to even really grasp, which for most people leaves us to simply deliver it directly in practice in the first instance.
- Secondly is the radically concealed and concealing nature of the core event in the individual - the very thing that stands to be rooted out and resolved in this pending cascade of transformation. And here we see the essential dilemma, and the reason all of this has remained so incredibly resistant over time, seemingly managing to maintain its concealment even in the face of enormous pressure. This is the aspect that has not only made the penetration of this core anatomy so difficult historically, but which even manages to prevent the average person from grasping this entire framework even when that anatomy is clearly presented to them. The forces that oppose such awareness becoming established - both within people and in general culture - are so profound and pervasive that the only things you can generally expect if you do stand up and point to all of this is either violent denial or passive avoidance. And in this we see the deadlock that has held us so trapped for millennia. It is not only that the critical information has been missing, but that even if it is found it remains almost impossible to communicate about that in any normal or reasonable way, thereby presenting a barrier to general understanding and propagation.

- Crowning all of this, then, we see the extraordinary current situation, where we see the tiny point of ignition that stands to set this whole landslide off - where an enormous body of information has now been accumulated, but not yet made available to the very few who might be capable of making use of that in the first instance. For a very long time just the possibility of making anyone aware of this entire potential, and what it all means, in any reliable way, has been completely out of reach. But that has now been established as an almost certain potential provided I am prepared to show up and explain it all directly and in person. And for a moment this looked like it might have been a breakthrough of sorts, albeit a somewhat messy and awkward one, given the unfortunate condition attached. But ultimately the only thing this opening led to, once it had been tested out more than enough times, was that whilst people were now able to grasp the overall significance of what was being proposed, very few were able to grapple with it in any reliable way. So it was now able to be delivered to anyone's doorstep, but they were then unable to pick it up, or even move it. And what this has now led to - in what appears to be the final hurdle in a very long series of obstacles it has faced - is the prospect of now delivering all of this to the very select audience who might be capable of lifting it. And this is where it now stands, teetering on the threshold. At this moment it has only been shown to a single person at that level, and we are currently awaiting feedback from them before it is rolled out more fully in that sense, with the aim being to first of all generate a brief process of collective exploration that might in turn provide a far more balanced and accessible and comprehensive ignition primer for the much wider process of cultural dialogue that will need to occur in this case. So watch this space.
- Finally, and the aspect we have not yet addressed in any detail here, is the entire personal dimension - the extreme demands associated and what all of that means in a context where it will now stand to be delivered up close and personal, so to speak. After all, the only thing that stands to be more intense than the immediate history of all this is the immediate future of it, where a red hot poker is going to be plunged into a block of ice. The reaction is going to be 'interesting', to say the least. So the question now becomes one of how best to open the way for that - to first of all account for all the damage associated, but also to somehow prevent even more damage now, in the face of such potent awareness being delivered into such a dramatically loaded context. Do not poke the porcupine, etc. But in this case we are going to need to do exactly that, so friendly porcupines are going to be essential, which once again takes us back to the previous point. The right people are going to be everything here. In any case, the whole thing does leave us in the position where my own story might eventually need to be told here, if only so as to clear the way for what must happen next. Somehow this very brief but very important transition stage will need to be made sustainable in some way, which really is quite a puzzle in this instance. There might never have been a more dangerous thing to attempt.

Therefore, this is where we will leave off here. What remains will be a far more detailed discussion and exploration of this curious combination - the nature of the tiny triggering event that is about to happen, and my own rather tortured connection to all of it at this final moment.

Thus, one final factor that comes into play here relates to the extreme lengths I have had to go to in order to push the whole thing this far, and that it was, in general, far beyond my abilities or resources - but that I have done it anyway. And what this means is that it not only cost me everything I have, right down to my bones, but that it also cost many people around me a great deal over time, and throughout all of that with no reasonable explanation at all. And eventually, even some of my most devoted supporters were unable to travel with me as we reached the summit of this particular mountain.

This shattered personal state matters if only because so much of the remaining information here has yet to be recorded or published in any way, which means I have to be prepared to provide that directly to anyone who appears to be approaching it with appropriate intent. So they are going to need to deal with me personally in that context, and dig it all up within the scope of some kind of long form conversation.

The problem with this, however, is that most people aren't able to take all that we have outlined here and calculate the final implications in relation to where the entirety of our broken world has remained stuck, and what getting it unhooked from that bind was always going to take. This is itself one of the things that will need to be accounted for here - the nature of the path that has led to this moment, and where that was always going to leave someone who attempted to crack this great nut once and for all.

Essentially, and given the extreme banishment of all cultural support, right down to the absence of any language to even begin to describe some of this territory, the entire journey that leads up to this pending threshold - which is by implication the highest stress transition in the whole chain of thresholds here - was always going to be a solo effort, with the ability to communicate any of it to even a single person not being possible until the end of the road was reached. Not one. Not really. Not the right person, and not in the only terms that matter. And this is no doubt where the entire thing has always failed historically - it was always going to be about perseverance and determination, about pure dogged tenacity, perhaps even ruthless and merciless monomania. It was always going to be about some person going far enough beyond the boundaries of normal life to find all of this in the first place, and then to do the much greater thing of carrying that great beast all the way back to the village, and somehow to survive the ordeal.

So what would someone look like at the end of such an epic mission? I mean, think about the particular task associated - that merely being to explain something that to you is now so completely obvious that you see it everywhere, and that isn't at all scary, but to confront at every turn an absolute sea of fearful weakness and passive stupidity. For years on end.

I should also say that I have not resolved this issue myself in the way that the theory here indicates as eminently possible for every individual, and there are some very good reasons for that - not only that doing so at any kind of repeatable level would require collective effort and development, but also that it is very important that this information come from someone who has not yet relinquished this great knot. Actually, in many ways I have probably amplified my own particular struggle, just to make it squirm. Basically, if the entire answer in this situation is to be found in the problem itself, then if you understand the problem fully, the solution becomes completely obvious. But if you don't understand it fully, then even if you happened to functionally relinquish that event in yourself, it would still remain completely enigmatic and mysterious to you. And for me, the aim was to resolve this issue in everyone, not just the solipsistic act of doing that in myself - what would that achieve? Who needs one more person achieving something that nobody around them can repeat?

The key thing is that understanding and realization in this instance are completely different events. And so it is that personally I maintain, have maintained, and will maintain, what you might call this 'diseased state' in order to be able to study and penetrate the nature of the problem itself, which in this case is the entire answer, and the very thing we have all been avoiding talking about, or looking at, or penetrating, in ourselves.

Which is to say, I am very fucked up. God only knows what afflictions I am suffering from, or the exact extent of the imbalances that currently exist. The level of cortisol in my system at this point would probably kill a bull elephant seal. I certainly won't be able to hold on for very long at this depth, so hopefully all of this will begin to move sooner rather than later. And I am certainly not presenting myself as any kind of exemplar, except perhaps for what anyone might look like if they went off in search of the single most toxic thing on the planet, and then spent years crawling all over that thing seeking to understand every aspect of it. It is even entirely possible that I am the single most unhappy person on the planet, whilst at the same time knowing more important information about happiness than anyone else alive at this time. And boy if that isn't an existential stretch! That was simply the price in this instance, which is exactly where it had been hidden, and why nobody had found it before, but still - it is not recommended. You definitely don't want to go where I have been in order to bring back what I have found. That was the whole point of doing it, but if only people understood, or were even remotely grateful.

Anyway, and as I say, I might tell that story at some stage, if only for those like you who are going to be dealing with me directly. And I did write all of that down at one point, when it looked like talking was going to be the new path. But then we realised that such a path also wasn't really open, once again due to the nature of the subject matter.

It was now easy enough for me to get anyone across this critical line in conversation, which was simple with people I know, because at least they know I am eminently rational, and not completely insane. I mean, like you have done here. Sometimes it just happens naturally in my case, organically as it were. But who would ever be interested enough to sit down with a complete stranger and talk about such massively profound stuff for a four hour stretch, knowing nothing about it when they went in? Pretty much nobody. Not to mention that almost all people who might be engaged in this casual way might ultimately have very little to offer it, even if they happen to end up very interested.

And this is what all those who had been captured by this immediately discovered. They would run off and tell a few close friends about it, only to confront the same wall I had been up against for so many years. So the propagation we had been testing was only one layer deep, and also occurring at entirely the wrong level, which meant it was totally worthless in light of the essential threshold we are currently facing, where moving beyond any reliance on me is now the whole point.

In this context, the small book Something Else was originally written in two parts - the Shallow End invite and the Deep End invite - but I eventually removed the entire second half if only because it was so turbulent, and really only pertained to anyone who was going to be dealing with me personally, and because most people who ever read that book would therefore never have the need. That whole book, just like what I am writing here, was never actually meant for publication in any sense. It was just a conversation starter, something you might send someone a link to if you were having a chat in a pub about anything that was getting a bit deep for beer and pretzels. And the second part was only ever going to be offered to anyone who made it through the shallow end conversation and wanted to go further. The whole idea of it was to be pretty noisy and messy and direct - which was itself a kind of primer for what conversation with me might be like. More importantly, it was to explain that I am essentially two completely different people, and which one you get will be determined by which context you decide to meet me in, and just how ready you are to play the game at the same level. And very few are.

I mean, think about it this way - the entire pending cascade is presently hanging on this transition from individual to collective. The essential insight has been captured, but at present nobody is aware of that, not in any truly engaged way, culturally speaking. It has not germinated yet, even though the seed has been discovered.

That germination is not defined by anyone talking to me, because anything that demands my input is still short of the defining threshold in that sense, by definition. So it is only when someone begins to talk to someone else about it that this line has been crossed at last. And can you presently do that? Have you ever done that? No. How would you do that?

I suppose you might give them a copy of this document you are reading now, but even this has not yet been published, and maybe never will. This is just some bullshit I am writing in order to clarify my own thinking.

So how would you ever have such a conversation, and on what grounds? How would you set that up in a way that was robust enough to be able to securely overcome the backwards tendency of typical culture and actually press forwards over time, thereby making progress in the direction of further insight together? You would need some kind of primer, some sort of foundational work, a framework within which to operate, an orienting blueprint as a kind of starter kit for such dialogue. And as I say, do we have that presently? No.

Therefore, this explains the current game - it is all about the generation of those cultural foundations. It is not about talking to me at all. It is all about setting the stage for that third person conversation to begin, and the necessary foundational resources associated.

This is the purpose for which I am making myself available. Only this. It is just about these last few yards. This is what I have not been able to formulate, if only because I am not exactly clear who I am speaking to in that regard. So when we do know, it will probably only take a single conversation to blow the entire thing open for everyone, because the moment we put those particular tracks in the snow, others will immediately be able to follow. And with that, the game will begin.

This is the thing - you need something from me. In particular, this is something that - in the current context - is both very demanding as well as profoundly dangerous. And that is something I am prepared to offer, essentially for free, but not at any cost. In particular, this is not an offer I can keep open indefinitely, or in the face of obvious passivity or ineptitude. Even if that lame response wasn't the cause of pretty much every bit of pain and loss I have ever suffered in this very long journey, a failure to at least approach all of this with the degree of seriousness and urgency it clearly warrants would be just plain rude. In that case you either haven't really seen it, or you simply don't qualify for it, and in either case there would be little obvious point in going any further. Indeed, there may even be dangers in that case.

What am I saying here?

Think of it this way -

What was offered in the snapshot above - or in any introductory 2EQ primer - is like a single big gold nugget, and I have carried it a very long way in order to bring it to you in this very clean and tidy manner. But this is only the start. There's "gold in them thar hills", as they used to say. That's all I'm going to be saying here really. And it is certainly not going to be all delivered in this solo manner. That will be a group endeavour by default now, and far beyond any individual effort. But in this instance the stakes are very high, and this will be my simple aim here in the beginning - merely to impress upon you what we are basically talking about, and what it all means.

In particular, there is one nugget out there as big as a dump truck, so big that I can't even move it. Not on my own. But I can show you where it is, if just a few will follow me back out there.

All of which is to say - if you like this bit, then don't just sit there, because you are going to have to dig the rest out for yourself. Or at the very least a few people will need to take that journey back out into the wilderness with me.

It all reminds me of an interesting encounter I had long ago. I knew an aboriginal fella once who made his living venturing into the Northern Territories to collect the hollow trees required to make didgeridoos, and I asked him one day if I could come along one time. It certainly sounds interesting, right? He looked totally blank for a moment, almost as if his hard drive had frozen, but then he snapped out of it, like waking up from a trance.

Where he went in that moment ultimately told me everything I needed to know - that I was not even remotely ready for that, but also that, out there in the bush, he would not be the same person I was currently speaking to. For a moment I got a brief flash of who he really was, beyond his civilised persona. He lived and breathed a connection to the land that I would never be able to truly harmonise with, for all that I might try, and the very obvious sense was that I would probably just slow him down.

The Northern rainforests of Australia harbour crocs up to 23 feet long, not to mention all the other things that will kill you just as fast as look at you - so whilst I may have been a fully grown man with lots of outdoor experience, for him it would probably still have been like taking a child.

As with so many different possibilities in life, the territory itself can change you. The demands will mould and condition you over time, and in that particular instance it was quite clear that his very jovial and lighthearted approach was just one face, and belied a far more formidable person beneath.

He clearly wasn't being in any way disingenuous with me in wearing the shallow mask I typically saw, or with anyone else he dealt with in any normal daily sense. This type of internal partition is simply necessary in certain situations, as we silo different aspects of ourselves into different modes, with different functions, and also to protect those around us from the forces associated with parts of ourselves that only belong to certain environments.

This is why I had taken the time in that much heavier second half of Something Else to expose my own end of all this, and in such personal terms. It is because you should never have even been reading that unless you had expressed interest in exploring all of this territory with me directly. So I was just making sure people knew what that actually means, and who I actually am.

This was the essence of what was being chewed over in the addendum - primary to the entire picture here is the most personal and dramatic conundrum. It was also a divergence I was never able to avoid in the early days, which is what caused all the damage and stress. And that truly heartbreaking paradox is this -

The potential we see indicated here is without any doubt the highest form of love available in all of human life, the greatest gift, by far, both for the individual and for the world, the highest form of friendship, and the deepest possible healing available. But in order to make that available to the average person in any reliable sense there will be a need to first of all explore something that is - in most people - being profoundly concealed by a very strong torrent of unconscious force. And what this means, most poignantly, is that love (the desire to offer the highest possible benevolent assistance to someone - in this case by healing the deepest of all their wounds) will at first be perceived as being the deepest possible form of personal attack.

Ultimately, it is all far deeper than you imagine. And the sort of rifts it can generate as a result are also profound. We really do have a conflict here, once we peel away all the pretence and confusion. And people will attack what they don't understand, especially if it tends to be very threatening emotionally.

I suppose it was always going to be the case - for a gain this big there was always going to be a catch. For every rose a thorn, for every treasure a dragon guarding it, etc. And this appears to be the biggest treasure of all - literally the keys to human happiness.

This part is quite real, and very deep. It is all due to the epic nature and scale of the alternative all of this presents us with - how fully that might morally eclipse anyone who sees it, but also how deeply absurd or even insane it might seem to anyone who doesn't. And especially at first, when the whole thing is still very small, the emotional and moral strength required to take such a stand - even if the fate of the entire world was at stake - is still very rare indeed. You would certainly not have a lot of company in the first instance.

In any case I figured you might like to see the hidden inside that goes with the outside you know, and that there was a lot more going on than you might have suspected. But also to see how I might be completely transformed the moment people are prepared to chat about all this at the right level, and how that will calm me down a lot. I am actually always calm in conversation with the right people, in the right context, if only because that level of dialogue has been the only missing element for all this time. And hopefully you will see this tomorrow when we chat, which is itself something that is only happening because at this point you have displayed exactly the sense of interest and urgency that defines you as being worth speaking to. So well done on that score.

•

So where does all of this leave us? What is the current state of affairs here? How can we understand this practically speaking? What can we do? And how will we know when it is working? Lots of questions start piling up.

The key thing to know in this regard is that there are many stages to the events all of this defines, and also many levels of engagement at each of those stages. Assuming of course that at least a few people are going to be brave enough to move forward down that path. So there are many choices on the menu here. And yet, as we have so clearly learned just recently, there really is only a single thing on the menu at first - which is to reach the elementary point of 'capture', where the basic nature and significance of what is being proposed becomes clear to you for the first time. If you don't stop at the door to at least pick up this little ticket right at the start then none of the other meals will be delivered to the right table, so to speak. There is an elementary chassis that needs to be established here, intellectually and morally speaking, an essential 'first base' that simply must be reached before anything else can occur. And if you miss it, all will be lost.

Why is this necessary? It is because of the seemingly universal disorientation and trance-like blindness that everyone starts out with in relation to the central framework of the paradigm, and especially in relation to some of the wider implications associated. And what this means is that in the first instance people really don't ever grasp the whole thing, not as they would any typical idea. It does not emerge gradually, or incrementally, like piling up sandbags to make a wall.

In this case you basically collect all the pieces at first, one by one, until you have all the required parts. And this part is normal. But then you need to stop and carefully put those together (usually with some help) so as to construct something different. And then, only once this arrangement has been correctly established, like building an engine, very suddenly a completely surprising outcome will be the result. You basically don't hear the 'big noise' at all, until suddenly, you do - it emerges whole as it were, almost as if out of nothing.

As indicated there, and as you will see if you have read through the Shallow End Invite document, the 'help' we are speaking of here is at this stage being provided by me personally, in the shape of a single long form conversation. This was also the origins of the addendum you see above - that was written when it became plain that I was going to need to assist people in this way, if only because doing so seems to reach this 'capture' threshold on an extremely reliable basis, whereas in writing people just don't ever seem to be able to figure out how to assemble the engine on their own.

Therefore, and as you will probably always see on the front page of the website, this chat has become the singular point of entry into all of this - the only open gate. None of which will make much sense until you realise that what you are reading here is not intended for open publication in any sense, and that I will only be speaking to a handful of people at most, and always in private. It is only the quality that matters.

So what is this chat? And what does that 'capture' achieve exactly?

Somehow, what you seem to gain in that instance is merely the orienting framework - sort of like the branches for the tree we will be building with all the rest of the theory. It gives you that basic scaffolding in this sense, around which all other development can then begin to unfold - and without which the entire thing will simply be a collection of disorganised parts.

Beyond that, however, and perhaps more importantly, what we see emerge at this moment of 'capture' is a kind of moral landslide event, where quite suddenly the overall downstream implications of all of this become plain and clear. And with this we see the 'why' of 2EQ emerging for the first time, which in this instance is an absolute torrent of ethical force.

To be clear, however, this energy does not get transferred from me to you in any sense - the paradigm itself delivers this moral impetus automatically the moment you truly see what it all means. It is simply built into the very nature of the situation itself, so all you really need to do is open your eyes and see. And that is all this brief chat will be checking for. So for some people it might take 30 minutes, whereas for others it might take 3 hours, but either way it will come as something of a shock.

In any case, with this 'capture' we see the emergence of a kind of threshold that is crossed, just one more example of a different stable equilibrium - in this case relating purely to insight, rather than any kind of physical or emotional state. But the principle is essentially the same - there is a steep transition up a kind of hill toward a summary point of release, beyond which everything just as powerfully tends to then roll forward toward increasing insight, rather than being forever pulled backwards into the previous state of blindness. It is almost as if a bubble bursts in the mind at that moment, as the blinkers fall away from your eyes - and with that there seems to arrive an enormous influx of motivational drive relating to the outcomes that come so clearly into view.

All of this matters here because of the way this seminal shift impacts the way people perceive and integrate any further information they might encounter over time as it relates to this core event being examined. Typically, most people will find all of that incredibly toxic and essentially pointless, but suddenly - once they see what is at stake - it becomes gold.

Remember - the underlying event being studied in this instance is itself a process of actively loaded emotional aversion, so normally this would function to sluff off any incoming awareness - but the moment this 'capture' is reached it is as if this tendency is transcended or inverted in a sense, so as to become an equal force of interest instead. And the moment that happens, especially in any context where further information is immediately available, that newfound interest immediately begins to compound and accumulate, further confirming this shift.

More importantly, once people have the basic framework to hang it all on, it starts to increasingly make sense to them. It starts to spontaneously self-organise into a coherent structure, in a series of 'aha' moments.

The point of which is to say - the threshold being indicated, where this moment of 'capture' occurs, has a tendency to polarise people. Even in the individual themselves we see this polarity, where the person they were yesterday would be in direct conflict with the person they are today, if ever the two were to meet.

You can see this polarity in many of the things I have written wherever I speak about the cultural boundary, and how important it is to uphold a clear separation between this emerging culture and the surrounding incumbent. And for a long time I wasn't exactly sure what I was saying in this regard, I only knew that it was very important somehow. I was picking away at it back then, seeking to get to the bottom of an itch that I couldn't scratch. But this 'capture' and the moral shift associated is what that boundary is really all about. It is just to say that those who have reached this summary point of elementary understanding (about exactly what is at stake in this situation) are in some sense fundamentally different to so called 'normal' people (in relation to the particular body of awareness being explored in this instance). And also that very little progress will ever be made here if those who have not quite reached this point were ever going to be allowed access to the very important levels of dialogue required to push all of this forward most effectively.

Importantly, you can see here how my perspective on such matters has shifted since I wrote all that stuff in the addendum above about stupidity etc. I was confusing 'capture' as we are now defining it here with all manner of things back then - intelligence, honesty, strength, etc. I was fishing around for something I couldn't really define.

There were several things I didn't understand. First of all, the characteristics being defined in this context relate only to this very narrow and bounded event, and the things that might qualify you for this may not necessarily represent wider human virtues. They are more like the equivalent of being light if you are a jockey, or heavy if you are a sumo wrestler - which one is right? They are both right, within their defining context. And this is the point - what we see here is a very specific context, an extreme and very particular arena. So whenever I used terms like 'intelligence', 'incompetence', or 'ineptitude' in the past, I was actually speaking about various characteristics that relate only to a person's ability to confidently navigate this very specific territory. And secondly, that these essential characteristics are not necessarily intrinsic at all, as I once imagined. As we just saw, the very same person can shift from a state of extreme aversion to one of equally extreme interest, without any shift in basic intelligence or strength. Indeed, and as we will see below, higher intelligence might actually be a heavier turtle to flip in this sense.

Therefore, and just to be clear - inside that new cultural boundary is an unnatural context, a special context, where special demands are upheld so as to produce special ends. It is not intended to be a model for how to live, any more than you should ever eat medicine for dinner. It is a tonic only, not a drink - a special and probably quite temporary event that will seek to very deeply inform just a few, so that the many will never need to know.

•

So what would possibly make sense of all this from your perspective now, so as to tidy all of this up for you? What would you need to know about where it currently stands, and about what comes next?

In the end it all depends on what you have to offer it, what stage you are arriving at, and what drives you as a person. So you will need to make up your own mind about that. But perhaps we can lay out the menu for you here, by at least explaining both where we stand now, where it might all go from here, and just how rapidly it might go there.

In order to see this we will now need to abandon our zoomed out vantage point and zoom right in on the details that surround the current bottleneck moment, and what defines that key transition.

So that's what we will do for the remainder of what follows. Which will, once again, seem like a lot of traffic for something so seemingly tiny, but with so much hanging on this single small fulcrum it is still worth explaining all of the surrounding context. In general this is always one of the main issues here, it is always about trying to talk about something really massive in a context where people still don't really grasp the scale, which makes you sound overly animated.

What matters most in this context is that the event is not a fixed reality, but a shifting and evolving process of spiralling deep level change, and that the demands of each stage will obviously change along the way. And the core lesson we have now learned in that regard was how important it is to be speaking to the right people, but also that those 'right people' may differ somewhat at each stage depending on the particular requirements associated. And in particular that the very highest demands will occur right at the beginning stages, which is where we stand at this moment.

We are gradually creeping up to a kind of tipping point here, beyond which a very small event might quite quickly snowball up into something very much bigger. The whole thing is a kind of downhill process from that initial spark, a collective process in that instance, like a kind of avalanche or landslide event. That is the future here, as we look forward from this highest peak of tension. But then, and looking back the other way, what we see is an epic climb that has led up to this triggering moment, and how all of that was very steeply uphill in the same sense, except in that case a purely individual ascent.

So the point where these two processes meet is the focus of our discussions here I suppose, given that this is where we currently stand. It could even be that in a week from now we will already have crossed this pending threshold, but as I write this sentence that is not yet the case, so I guess all I can do is take a snapshot from this very extreme vantage point, knowing full well that it may end up almost immediately outdated in some sense.

Clearly it is a very complex subject, but we are trying to be very simplistic here, so I will simply do what I can to pull forward a few important factors that come together to frame the current transition from the perspective of various different types of people, or levels of interaction. The main thing to grasp is that the uphill aspect of this entire thing has already been completed at this point, leaving us to discuss only the demands associated with beginning the next half of the process.

First of all, however, we need to sweep away one big iceberg of misconception that will tend to sink this ship of comprehension before it even gets out of the harbour. It is an issue that keeps coming up, a kind of category error that very persistently seeks to colour this emerging paradigm with the wrong brush. And that misconception is this -

2EQ is not a philosophy.

For many years the main problem with 2EQ was that people couldn't even bring themselves to look, and even if they did that they didn't really understand it at all. It was kind of inevitable after all, given the nature of the central insight and what it brings to light.

Strangely, however, and even now that people are beginning to take a little more interest, this one very deep misunderstanding seems to persist. Perhaps it has to do with the way this core insight is being introduced into a culture that has been saturated for so many centuries with ideas that are, well, just that - merely ideas. But what 2EQ points to is not an idea at all. It is not even a psychological model, at least not primarily. That is not what it will be remembered for. The function is not to adjust your perspective in some way, to provide consolation, or even transcendent insight - not at that level. It is not a different way of thinking about thinking.

The only really significant thing it points to is a direct and singular process of very deep level change, so deep that most people can't even begin to fathom it in any meaningful way. Not at first.

The problem in this instance seems to be just that - it is all related to just how dramatic that pending reality is, so much so that in general people seemingly can't stretch their imagination to encompass it fully. And what this does, most commonly, and even if people embrace the broad paradigm, is that it leaves people holding onto the theory only, as if that was an end unto itself.

The outcome of this is a kind of simple minded appreciation of something that is far deeper and more profoundly impactful than many people can naturally grasp - like all those people in camper vans watching Elon shoot rockets into space. They obviously don't understand the science, but they also don't understand the impetus - that it is about existential risk, not just a bit of exciting entertainment.

The resulting situation in this case is sort of similar, where people end up holding onto a kind of 'magic rope' that seems to hang upwards in a big loop, instead of falling down. So they talk to people about that rope, and tie little beads all over it - going on endlessly about how amazing it is, how it seems to stay up there by itself etc - whilst for all that time the elephant on the other end of that rope remains completely invisible to them, and also to whomever they might be talking to.

To be clear, then - all the complicated theory is just the rope. It means nothing ultimately, not next to the significance of the elephant. And the person who walked in holding this elephant in the first instance (me) is even less important, and that's what I was explaining in the addendum.

Nevertheless, we do see this come up almost immediately whenever people only gain some cursory awareness of the subject matter, and what it all might mean. They become infatuated with the anatomy associated, and how much it explains about the current situation in the world, as well as the present state of the typical individual. And in light of that infatuation (and still not really seeing the elephant) the immediate impulse is to want to share what they see with others at that shallow level, or share links with friends. But this is to completely misunderstand what is being said here.

How would that possibly help? How would that assist the primary event here, and how would that possibly help your friends?

What 2EQ provides for is a comprehensive understanding of the core anatomy of human suffering. So I have to ask you - how might knowing that help you?

Does knowing you have leprosy help you in any way with leprosy? Does intellectual insight heal it? Will the establishment of a 'leprosy club' do that? No.

This is not to say that mere knowledge has no value. It is true that a few people will indeed need to penetrate all of this very deeply, and in the process that they may experience a considerable degree of transcendence over the events they are looking at. And it is also true that for some people the mere knowledge alone will be a kind of revelation, it will finally scratch an itch that for these people has been there for years. But let's be clear, once again - that would be rare. The type of person who will find the answer interesting in that sense is only those who have asked the question, and those people are few and far between. Which means that for the rest (almost everyone) the theory on its own is completely worthless.

For instance, even our chat tomorrow, what would be the point of that? That is interesting in that it forces me to compress it all down into the simplest possible terms. And so some people may end up liking that chat sequence in due course, they might even hand it around, as if that was the point. But that will not be the point at all. The only reason will be that doing so might be seen as valuable at this stage, as a kind of stepping stone to a far deeper process of engagement that such a sequence might lead to, thereby exposing a completely different end goal.

Essentially, I am about to begin chatting with people at a totally different level to this, and in light of that I figured this might produce a kind of appetizer in a sense, just a snack sized version to help get us rolling. That's all. And that's why all of this can be so light and free at your end - you are not being invited to do anything here. I just thought you might like to meet the elephant, that's all. You are not really being invited to anything more than that, not unless you really want to be.

So this is the big misunderstanding here - to merely know about this hidden anatomy is not anything in itself. Indeed it might even have negative life value overall unless the result is that you manage to connect with others who have similarly become aware of all this. And even then, all that would make you is a black sheep amongst other black sheep.

It is also tremendously complex and dynamic as a theoretical framework, which for most people would mean gradually acquiring a great deal of very detailed understanding over time, in order to truly see how all of the underlying mechanics work etc.

And once again - to what end? Why would you bother? Just to know the truth? To finally see the face of the beast that has you in its maw?

Sure, I get that. For me this was a motivation, but I am not normal in this sense. For me the truth matters. I would sacrifice any number of things for a single defining truth. But for most people, how does the truth help, if the truth is suffering, and if nothing can be done about it? What would be the point?

So this is the issue we are coming up against now that all of this is suddenly making its way out into the wild. Even when people get it morally, when they really grab hold of the rope and hang on, they often still don't really see the only thing that matters, or what needs to come next. They still don't really grasp the elephant, what it means, or just how big it is. And so it is that they immediately want to share it at that level, to people who will not be able to see the elephant at all. And once again - to what end?

Therefore, we need to make this aspect very clear -

What 2EQ points to is an anatomy of sorts, and yes at that level it is theoretical in a sense. But the only really important thing about that core framework is the practical potential it so clearly indicates.

It defines the natural organic system, then it defines an added conflict that has occurred, and finally it explains very clearly how that added event might be stripped away and resolved under certain circumstances. But the point is not just to see that this is possible - the point is to actually do it.

Importantly, this potential 'release' event is something that we do already see occasionally in a few rare individuals, as indicated many times already, having apparently occurred for them somewhat accidentally, but never in a context where that possibility has been comprehensively understood. And what this means is that these people really have found something important, but that they can never repeat that in anyone else, if only because they don't really know what it is. So this is like the exact opposite of those who don't quite understand 2EQ yet, and who are just left holding onto the rope - this is like having an elephant rampaging around, except this time without any rope to catch it. People everywhere can see that something has happened for these individuals, but they can't really get hold of it, or catch it for themselves.

This is the point of 2EQ. The theory is just a means, not an end, and the target audience is not the open public. Not at first - that part will only come later. The blueprint (the theoretical paradigm itself) is just a map, not the territory. And this is the error that people make when they get all excited and want to hand it around to their friends - it is like seeing a picture of a hamburger on a menu, and then giving your friend that menu - telling them to eat it. It is a little absurd.

But this does indicate the sad reality that for so long we have been saturated in a culture that offers only this type of vacuous belief driven consolation. This is the only thing people know and understand - it is all about finding a club to belong to, or an explanation that makes us feel better about the sorry and confused state of our life. But that's not what this is. This is much bigger than that. Indeed, there has never been anything like this before, which is sort of the problem we face here.

It is true that some people will need to become deeply aware of all the anatomy associated. And it is also true that they might find very deep satisfaction in knowing all of that, and also in being part of a group that has all of this as its primary focus of attention. But those people are few, and also very highly qualified, in just the right sense. And yes, those people will indeed be holding onto the same rope as all the rest, except that in their case - unlike most people - they will also immediately be able to see the elephant. This is precisely what will define them as being qualified.

Which brings me to my point: It is only the elephant that matters here. The rope is just a rope. The theory means nothing in and of itself, regardless of how much it might explain. Psychology for the sake of psychology is as worthless as an empty can of sardines.

So what is the elephant in this metaphor?

The big thing, the only really important thing about all of this, is the practical relinquishment of this added complex, and for that to be made accessible to the average person in due course.

In particular, the task will be to make that possibility available to people in a reliable and achievable sense without the need to know anything at an intellectual level.

I just need to make this clear -

It will become realistically accessible to people without the need for them to understand anything about it.

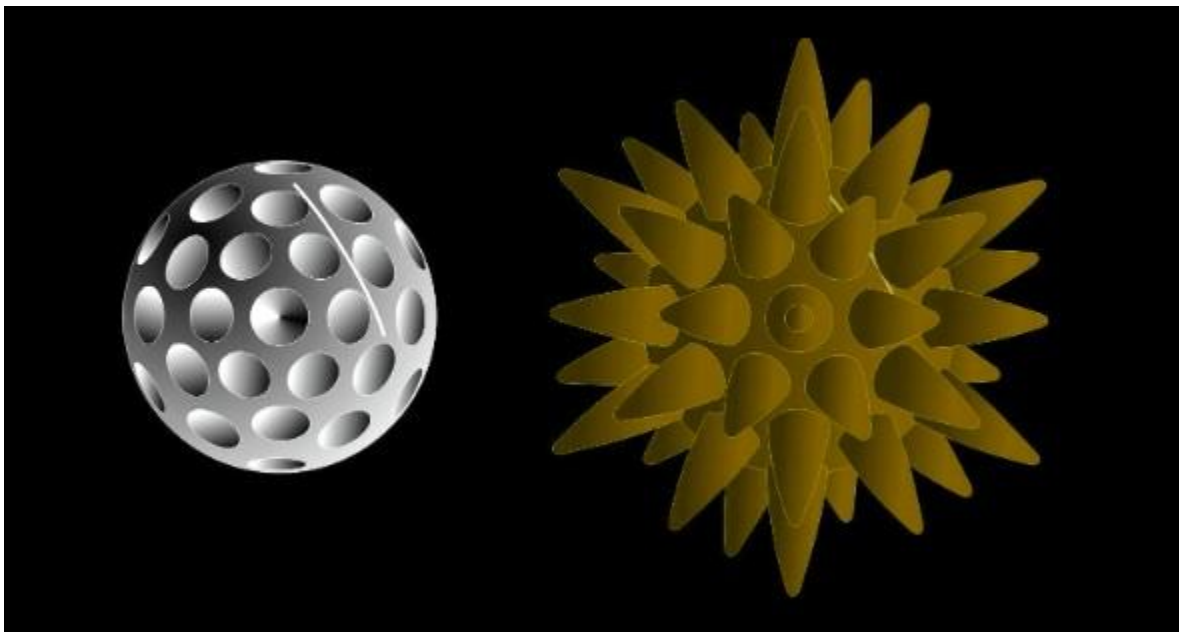

(please read that sentence a few times)

Therefore, why would you hand any of this information to a friend in purely theoretical terms? What would be the point? What is the value of doing that? How would that possibly help? Unless the person you are handing it to happens to have a PhD in existential psychology, then what possible benefit might there be in making anyone aware of any of this prior to the practical applications becoming available? And even once that does happen, why would you need to make them aware of it? Does cleaning up after a hurricane make you want to become a meteorologist? No.

People don't need to know. They don't need to know before, and they won't need to know after. Because as I said -

2EQ is not a philosophy.

We sometimes use the metaphor of the prickle ball to explain this aspect -

A prickle ball is a soft kids toy that has spikes all over it, with a hole at one end, so that it can be turned inside out. And this explains the typical human state vs the free human state - it is like the two stable states this ball can be resting in. Two stable equilibriums - hence 2EQ.

It would obviously be a lot easier to explain this if I could simply hand you one of these toys to play with, but you will just have to imagine it for the moment.

The point of this metaphor is that you could turn this ball inside out, so that the colour would change, with all the prickles now pointing inwards, and then throw that toy onto a rocky beach for a million years to be smashed by an endless number of random waves, and when you came back it would still be in the very same very stable state. It will not have turned inside out again, or even come close to that sort of thing happening.

Really, even if you picked it up and noticed the hole on one end, and then tried to push it through that hole from the other end, it still won't work - the whole thing will simply bind up.

In this sense it represents a sort of intractable puzzle, and a very stable state. This seemingly fixed equilibrium is what makes it a good metaphor. And yet, if you did examine the entire thing just a little bit more closely, or even just played with it long enough, eventually you might realise that it can indeed be popped inside out quite easily once you know how, so as to reveal an entirely different stable equilibrium - a hidden potential in this sense.

Just to be clear, however - nothing will have changed. Not structurally. The exact same form will be present, with no additions or subtractions whatsoever. It is exactly the same ball. And yet, the whole thing will now exist in a completely different orientation, and relating to it would be quite a different experience.

The point here is that this would never happen just naturally in any normal sense, but that once you know how, it is actually quite easy to achieve. This is the power of insight.

This is what seems to happen occasionally by accident - sometimes people are apparently just playing around with their own internal prickly ball in this sense, seemingly not content to just let it rest in the stable internalised state of conflict it is currently in. Usually they end up in some extreme state of tension, and suddenly - pop! They end up in a completely different configuration somehow.

And this is actually quite real, that's what 2EQ defines very clearly. But how can such a 'suddenly awake' person explain such a state, given that nothing was actually added? What can they point to? What do they have that nobody else has? Nothing!

All they can do is say - 'wow, everything is different now', but how does that help anyone? So people may try desperately to copy what has occurred for that individual. But as I say, if all you do is try to poke the inside of that ball through the hole it will only jam up, so people just end up frustrated and bewildered. And this is why enlightened gurus do not produce enlightened adepts. They only produce throngs of frustrated devotees. They sell hope, not reality. And that's what makes 2EQ different. It won't be selling anything. It is just going to deliver it at last, essentially for free, and without any information required. And most especially it is going to be certain - a known input for a known output.

You won't need to believe anything, or even know anything about it. There will be no possibility to 'follow' it, because it will have no leaders.

So what would you do if you discovered this anatomy? What if the structural reality of this 'prickly ball' became obvious to you somehow, along with all of its detailed and dynamic potentials? What would be the important export?

The structure would be important, but why? Only because of the really important thing it might inevitably lead to, which is the reality of finally understanding this possibility of turning the entire thing inside out. What else matters in the end?

So - would you want to share all of that detailed anatomy with everyone? No. All of the complex engineering level complexity would be completely beside the point for most people, who ultimately only want to be released from the trap. They don't want to know all the detailed anatomy of their trap, and they don't need to. They don't even want to look back at their trap once they have escaped from it. They just want to be released from it.

Not to mention, as we have seen, just how toxic that awareness might be for the vast majority of people. Really, the very last thing we need is a whole bunch of hyper-enthusiastic people running around spraying this information out into the world, when they themselves don't even really understand what is being said, or what the only point would be.

I mean, as I say, you might be able to answer this one for yourself in a day or two. We are going to go through it, end to end. And doing so might eventually help a few other people get their heads around it. But to what end in your own case? Will that even be of any value to you? And I don't mean to be in any way demeaning, but this is very heavy and complicated stuff. Do we really need a million 18 year old kids showing up here? No, probably not. Present company excepted of course. But really, what would be the point in that?

More importantly, I wonder if you are going to think knowing all of this has even improved your life in any way? You can tell me I guess, that will be interesting to see. But I seriously doubt it.

After all, and as I say, how does knowing all of this help, if you can't actually do anything about it at this early stage?

So what is the point, then? The point in this instance is merely to use this very simple explanation as a kind of springboard in order to reach a much more significant level of the same conversation. And you will be welcome to join that level also if you wish, but it will be something completely different to this.

The point is that there are a very rare few who will have what it takes in order to unpack and deploy all the various insights this framework delivers, and in a way that will require very little from the end user.

The point is that there really is value in some people becoming aware of all this, and also in the propagation of such awareness, but only within a very limited stratum of culture as we currently know it, and that all the rest can basically be left in a state of complete ignorance.

This is the cold hard truth here, and the thing I struggled so deeply to finally accept: It is altogether best that most people do not see this coming.

It is only very recently that it has become clear just what this really means, and how to best navigate the resulting situation. Several things had not been apparent until a particular point had been reached, where we thought we must be approaching the end of the road, only to discover that this was just a mirage of sorts.

Initially, I had always assumed that what we were aiming for was just this 'capture' being indicated. Which is to say - to be able to bring any person to the point where they are able to broadly calculate everything that is at stake in this situation, and what might be done about it. But it turns out this was a bit of a red herring in and of itself. There was one more step to take, and one more thing to learn. Capture is not enough, at least not at the very beginning, where the whole thing is only going to be easy for those who have the appropriate qualifications. And this lesson also happens to explain what we might expect to see if all of this ever made its way out into the wider collective in any broadcast sense. Actually, it could even be that there are many instances where bringing someone to this elementary point of 'capture' may be a decidedly negative outcome.

So how could this be? Let me explain -

Overall, if we look at all people in general, and sort them into basic groups based on how qualified they might be in relation to this emerging event, we can begin to see a kind of layer cake in a sense, or perhaps like a pyramid I suppose, given that the higher you go the fewer people there are in each group.

Imagine, then, that at the bottom there is a huge thick layer that takes up most of the pyramid. This is most people in this instance, who will not even be able to look at any of this. And even if they do look, they generally won't be able to see it. It sounds terrible of course, but this blindness is completely normal in a sense, and means that the defining tenets of common culture are doing their important job of insulating the average person from this roaring underlying crisis.

In any case this vast group won't really understand it at all, even if you tell them. They will just stare at you blankly, with no real idea what you are even going on about.

So, clearly, there would be no point in even making this group aware of any of this in the first instance. It will mean nothing to them in theory alone, and they will also have nothing to offer it in any meaningful sense.

Above this layer we see a smaller group again, where we see a bit more of the necessary qualifications in certain regards, at least emotionally and intellectually. But at this level what it means is that the blindness and aversion is beginning to slip, but not quite to a degree that might allow someone to reach any point of summary capture. And so the result of this tends to only be extreme hostility, especially as a group. Whereas the former much larger group is not really impacted at all - with the whole thing just rolling off them like water off a duck's back due to a more extreme degree of conditioned blindness - at this level we see the whole thing penetrate somewhat, but only against fierce resistance.

At this level of general competency people see it immediately, at least in some sense, and they definitely don't like it. And the reason for this is because it is an argument they are already having with themselves, like an internal war, in this case one that they are on the verge of losing. And so in this context they experience such awareness as being particularly unwelcome, which paradoxically means that there would be even less reason to make this level aware in any sense, even though they are actually more qualified for such. It will only be perceived as a hostile attack for these people, and in general that is all they will have to offer in return.

We should also stop here to make it clear that what we just defined in these two groups is most people, the vast majority by far. Leaving us only a tiny sliver of the population remaining.

At this level we see a kind of golden line, a separation in a sense, an important partition.

The next group, the next layer in this pyramid so to speak, are those who - for whatever reason - manage to penetrate this emerging awareness sufficiently to be able to essentially grasp what it all basically points at, and especially what it might mean. And at this level what we see emerging is perhaps just a certain basic courage and honesty, combined with natural curiosity, all of which is then exercised within a context of a healthy degree of practical morality. It could even be that this group is not actually as smart as the previous one, not intellectually. After all, some of those who most ferociously react to this awareness are also fiercely intelligent. They are just very afraid, and not particularly morally developed in certain regards. But here we see the more primary human virtues clustering together to produce what we have in general been calling the 'right stuff' for this emerging paradigm.

These various different layers only recently became obvious in the wake of being able to so reliably reach this point of 'capture' in direct conversation.

For the base layer, where people are basically blind and incapacitated, that conversation would be a hard uphill climb on a very slippery slope, so that even if we reached this point of clarity in conversation, the result would not be lasting in any sense as the whole thing just got swept away again like leaves in the wind.

So this is a level we tend to simply avoid where possible - the proverbial dead wood, intellectually speaking. For goldilocks this person would be too cold - essentially not smart enough to even look, let alone understand, and certainly not capable of actually doing anything about it. So for this person the world around them (the old world) remains the destination by default. They have no concept that things could be very different, and also no drive in that regard. So for these people the new world will need to actually arrive before they will begin to adapt to it. The mass of people are essentially a herd of sheep in this sense, just a big mindless lump, following each other around in circles.

In our 'existential prison', this group represents most of the inmates - downtrodden and defeated.

Above that, whenever we tried this with someone a bit smarter, and even if they had initially been able to accept the broad premise at an intellectual level, once again the result would be an immediate regression into some kind of violent denial or passive avoidance.

For goldilocks this person would be too hot - this person is smart enough to understand, and even capable enough to make a meaningful difference, but essentially just not quite moral, brave, or honest enough. And once again, this person will forever remain trapped within the gravitational pull of the incumbent state, and the old world we see. They will even violently defend the status quo, regardless of being so demonstrably unhappy there.

This group imagines they are happy. They think they've got it made. The world is their oyster etc. But actually all they have done is create for themselves a secure bunker in the sense indicated above. And the type of happiness they imagine they have is not even remotely adjacent to what they would naturally experience in the free state. It also costs the world a great deal. Nevertheless, this group very strongly believes in their own clearly self-evident superiority - that they know what needs to be known, and are doing the right thing, in the best possible way - even as the world is crumbling down around them. It is a stance that requires a very powerful blinkering, and an equally assertive self-righteousness. Hence I have come to call this group the 'smugtards'.

In this prison, this group are the proverbial kingpins, the few who have risen to the top in this septic heap, and who seemingly like it there.

Which only leaves us to examine the very small group who will confront this burgeoning awareness and immediately roll the other way - towards insight and empowerment, and towards freedom.

For this group what we see is the same basic conversation taking place, but at the end of it the essential capture they end up with will somehow manage to overcome any residual tendency to wash that away again, and will also be morally engaged at some deep level, thereby igniting a spiral of increasing interest and comprehension, which is perhaps more to the point.

Most likely it is this ethical aspect, in combination with a certain basic ability to calculate the overall implications - both for themselves and for the world - that allows for all other factors to be swept aside.

And in this prison, here we see the first group who may actually have been wrongfully convicted. This group will not become part of the masses, and will also not suck up to the parasites resting at the top. They will only sit there quietly, scheming daring escape.

In any case, the result of this combination in these people is what we might call 'moral capture', rather than some merely intellectual level comprehension. And for goldilocks what this means is that this person is just right - honest enough to look, curious enough to explore, smart enough to see, and brave enough to act. And as a result of all this - regardless of any other qualifications - for these people the new outcome becomes the only worthy destination state, both for themselves, and for the world as a whole.

And this is why we say there is a golden line separating this group from the layer below, it is because of the very different outcome states associated with each of these cultural forms, and how deeply conflicting they will tend to be if ever they are forced to mingle.

Indeed, we say 'golden line' here only from the perspective of anyone already committed to this alternative outcome state - the return to the natural equilibrium etc - due to just how golden it will be to find others who have reached this same point of clarity, if that is where you have ended up. But actually the term 'battle line' might be more appropriate, in relation to confronting all of those who haven't quite made it that far yet.

More importantly, this dichotomy cannot be overcome. This is simply the cost associated with such a deeply penetrating possibility. Like poking a balloon with a pen - it will either be moved, or popped. But either way, if you happen to be in one group, relating to those in the other group will be difficult beyond that point.

So how is it that people with the 'right stuff' manage to take the right turn at every different point, as they gradually penetrate all of this? What is their secret? What do these people know that others seemingly don't know?

It all seems to merely be about their own ability to calculate a single relationship in real time, so as to be able to see where they currently stand in connection to the events being defined. It is not just an accident. They have simply earned over time the right level, or combination, of basic moral and intellectual capacities - characteristics that define them as being over a certain minimum threshold, once again sort of like being able to keep your head above water in the deep end of the pool. You either can, or you can't. And the more you can do it, the more you tend to be able to do it, and so that ability only increases over time. Whereas those who can't basically do it right from the start really don't tend to get much better at that, if only because they generally just start to drown. And this is a distinction we are now getting very serious about here, based on a great deal of experience.

However, it is also fair to say that one very big factor here is simply how much information a person has been exposed to overall, given the way it makes a certain kind of sense - but only beyond a certain critical mass, so to speak. Which once again points to another factor that may define what the 'right stuff' is in this context - i.e. not being so full of yourself that you won't even bother to take a close enough look. In other words - don't be a smugard.

So what is that basic calculation? Ultimately it simply seems to be about the ability to grasp the scale and significance of the epic cascade being indicated, and then to place that within a context where that entire thing is currently being actively prevented from igniting due to the very thing this insight brings to light.

More than anything else it appears to be the scale of the events that gets people, and the fact that all of this is coming from out of the blue. They really can't imagine a totally different world to the one they see around them today, and even less imagine for themselves a personal state that is so far removed from everything they have known. And this seems to be what the few with the right stuff can manage to grasp. For whatever reasons, their particular combination of emotional and intellectual assets allows them to see beyond 'what is' in the current state of things, to see what 'might be' if just a couple of things shifted. Somehow the wool has not been entirely pulled over the eyes of these people, and as a result they manage to escape the cultural and psychological trap we have been left in. They have an instinct for the free state, and the free world, even if they still can't see it directly. And their basic level of honesty also leaves them open to the idea that there might indeed be something quite wrong, both with the world, and with themselves. There is a kind of humility required, as well as an ability to look beyond all of our condition blinkering.

For there to be two stable equilibriums for the world as a whole - based on their being two for every individual - was always going to define a very stable state at both ends. At one end the very conflicted world we see today, like a dank and ancient forest of deep personal suffering, struggle, and pain. And what it means to be trapped in the illusion is that, as you walk amongst it, everything you see will tell you that it is really not open to any kind of significant change. But that is just a perception based on ignorance, and this is precisely what the emerging paradigm brings to light: Under the right circumstances, a single spark might bring the entire thing down. The scale of the forest will then be matched exactly by the scale of the forest fire that follows, as the entire underlying conflict is swept away into ash, leaving a completely different situation in its wake. Also, and just as importantly, all that suffering will never return. Once again - two stable equilibriums.

So how can we understand these two types of people? What separates these two groups? And how might we identify which group any person belongs to in this regard?

If we view this whole thing from a slightly different perspective now, as we line up each one of the various thresholds we have so far collected, each one being the point of tension between two bowls, what we see is that the middle - where these two states intersect - is inherently unstable in each situation, and that over time the tendency of the organism will always be to resolve back into one or other of the two stable states. This is simply another way to express a situation where two stable equilibriums exist - the 'law of the unstable middle' is the same explanation in reverse.

This is precisely what each of these thresholds mean, and also what a transition across each one implies. It means there really are no middle states, no grey areas, no maybes or partial transitions. At least nothing permanent. There is no stable warm place in each case - over time there is only hot or cold, one bowl or the other is always dominant and therefore always pulling you back to the centre of the equilibrium it defines.

This was the final lesson we had to learn here. It turns out that people in general will fall into one of two very different groups in this particular regard. I don't claim to understand all the mechanisms, and it probably doesn't matter, it is no doubt just a chance combination of factors at any given time.

But the outcome is always the same - people will never stay in the middle once they are confronted with all of this information and the possibility of moving from ignorance to awareness. The law of the unstable middle, once again. They will always end up either rolling forward bravely toward awareness and action, or passively retreating back into unconscious avoidance. And this is why the insight can be so polarising. It literally defines two different kinds of people, two tribes in a sense. And having the 'right stuff' here places you very firmly in one camp, which also happens to be the stark minority. Basically, for people with the 'right stuff', reaching the point of 'capture' we have been indicating will produce not only intellectual understanding, but also the much deeper moral impetus associated. In other works we have defined this as a kind of 'conversion' in a sense, which sounds almost religious, but in this context it merely means that someone has truly grasped what is being proposed in a way that is not just in their head. It's a bit like telling someone that there is a tsunami coming up the road - they might understand the concept at an intellectual level, but you only know that they have truly understood what you are saying when they stand up and start running. At which point you might scream, as you chase them up the hill.. 'Yes, now you're getting it!'

But was that the final answer? Is that all we need here - just a whole bunch of very enthusiastic people who 'believe' in the potentials all of this theory points toward?

How would that help if it didn't actually assist in making the release of that crisis available to people?

Is it even possible that having a whole lot of people who believe in the whole thing in theory, without any ability to deliver it in practice, might be a decidedly bad outcome?

Yes. I mean, how would that help? Would that not basically just be identical to every guru on the planet? All blow and no go? Do we really need more of that stuff?

This might also make sense of another underlying puzzle you may have been chewing on here, as we take this whole clock apart to see where it is broken. We are focusing so heavily here on this tiny little threshold, and the few who might be involved as we learn to spark that ignition again and again. But why bother with all of that? Why can't we just stand up and shout about it?

When I first confronted the need to talk, that's also what I thought. I even built a little podcast studio. But I didn't understand this pyramid. I knew it was wrong even then, but I thought it was just my own resistance to talking. But no, I didn't really grasp that not only would there be no need to inform most people, but that imposing such awareness by force on anyone below that golden line would only cause a great deal of unnecessary damage and distress. That's what this line essentially means - people below that level are simply not ready to know this, and that's most people.

We are literally talking about an entirely different world, and a completely different personal state. And in particular, it is a world finally free of something that is presently scaring the living shit out of most people. So for those people, there is not only the very scary prospect of something so dramatic that it would disrupt pretty much everything they know, but that would - in the first instance - also confront them with the very thing they already fear the most. And this is why they will defend that terrible state with their life, even though they are - in general - very unhappy there.

This is also why there is a sort of terminal conflict that arises at this level of the pyramid, a flip in a sense, where the extremely asleep will confront the extremely awake, which is why we really need to keep these two groups apart if we can. There really is no way to bridge this gap, not in the first instance where all you have to go on is the theory. Later on, once the practical aspects emerge with force, none of this will matter, but for now this conflict appears irreconcilable.

In the end the only way for any person to move beyond this 'alien' perception, and to thereby have no issue at all with this other culture, is when they finally grasp the actual nature of the situation in sufficient resolution to be able to directly transcend the avoidance implied. But for the individual who makes this shift, that doesn't really resolve the conflict, it merely leaves them standing on the other side of it. If you can't beat 'em, join 'em, etc.

So whilst that person will no longer have any issue with anyone on the inside of this new cultural boundary, this same shift will immediately set them apart from all those on the outside. So rather than winning the war, they will merely have changed sides. They will have gained massive natural alignment with anyone else who also understands, but in the same stroke placed themselves in the same toxic position in relation to common culture.

Therefore, for any individual to shift from being part of common culture to this newly emerging framework is obviously possible, after all that is the whole point of what we are doing here. But for these two cultural events to engage with each other is basically a disaster every time, which is what made my own journey so toxic. I was forced to develop all the associated language within the context of common culture, rather than within the new and clearly bounded environment that is emerging now. I didn't even know that was possible back in those days, let alone how to generate such a context.

•

So this is how it is going to work -

Just a few people will need to know. And for those people it will all be relatively easy and natural - that's what it means to be qualified for the event. At that level there will need to be a foundational primer established, and that's what we are currently about to begin - that means having the same sort of conversation as I am about to have with you, but this time at an entirely different level, with entirely different people.

The point of which is that - just like you - those people will not be an end unto themselves in that context, but that they will merely be representative of anyone else at that high level, and hopefully ask all the right questions that anyone at that level might naturally ask, thereby seeding the establishment of that broader conversation at that level of culture.

We may eventually do this a few times in due course, maybe even many. But the point will be to simply open the entire field up in this sense, and to thereby put this mountain on the map at last. It is currently completely missing from all of our cultural descriptions of reality, so that even though there are currently many people who might be eminently qualified for - and deeply interested in - such a potential, they don't even know it is there, and wouldn't have the language to be able to speak about it with anyone even if they did have some inkling.

So this next level of conversation - in a somewhat more comprehensive end to end format - will immediately open this territory up for everyone who needs to know, merely by going in there one time and having a look around. A GoPro and a flashlight, etc. People will then be able to follow in those footsteps, and be able to go further on their own. The moment we put this mountain on the map, immediately we will see people trying to climb it.

But just to be clear - this is not everyone! This is a big mountain, it is dangerous, and we don't want children (or the adult equivalent) trying to do this. You really would need to be an experienced mountaineer in this sense. Even a high degree of enthusiasm won't help you at that level, not if you basically can't climb in the advanced sense being defined.

So we might go back to our pyramid once again at this point, so as to add one more tiny layer right at the tip, high up in the atmosphere, perhaps even in the stratosphere, intellectually speaking. At this level what we see is an elevated micro population of people who will have no trouble at all with a mountain so high.

It is only this level that will need to receive this information at first, and it is also only at that level that it will need to propagate, all behind closed doors. Nobody else will even need to hear about it.

That will be the quiet beginning. The seed will be planted at last. But before too long - assuming that the structure of that seed contains information that is indeed correct - the buzz at that level will be intense. It will bubble and boil away, growing sideways at that level, as that entire stratum of culture becomes infected with the possibility associated, which of course they will be able to see. These people will immediately see the elephant in the sense we indicated above, and know exactly what it means, which is what makes them qualified at that highest level. If we were lighting a fire, this would make them 'dry tinder' in this sense.

Once again, however, and just to be clear, even those rare people are not the target audience ultimately - they are merely the initial focus, the interim short term bridge. We need to distinguish short term from long term here. The final and only target here is the average person, far lower down, in the long term. Billions of them. It is all about the base of the pyramid, except by that stage in completely different terms. It's just that to go so low, we have to go high first.

And this is what we will eventually see here - eventually that highest level of the social pyramid will become so heavy with interest and insight that it will burst as it were, and begin to collapse downward like an avalanche. A fire will ignite. A spiralling collapse will begin. What started off as only a small and private event will eventually become a very big and very public process of cascading personal transformation.

So what will they be dropping? Theory? No. They will be dropping directly accessible practical applications. They will be dropping elephants! No strings attached.

This is the only outcome being pursued here. And so, if whatever you feel like doing about all of this does not in some way reflect or support this singular outcome, then you should probably stop doing it. And this is why we have become so vociferous in relation to seeking to exclude the 'average person' from this arena in the first instance. A little understanding is a dangerous thing, etc.

Therefore, if we go back to the prickly ball analogy - what we are not seeking to do here ultimately is explain to everyone the detailed anatomy of a prickly ball. That would be futile, and pointless. This is not a prickly ball club that you might belong to, and believing in prickly balls will not help you.

The only thing that people want at the end of the day is freedom. What they want is to simply be able to turn this ball inside out, so as to restore its natural and free form. And that is what 2EQ is actually all about. That really is the only thing it is about, with everything else merely being subservient to that.

We therefore have two completely different audiences here in a sense, as well as two different timelines. There are the few who will need to very deeply examine and explore all the complex anatomy associated, so as to be able to get the ball rolling at the right level in relation to establishing a broader conversation amongst those few who are capable of such deep consideration. And then there is everyone else, who will essentially need to know nothing at all.

So if you are going to hand this to anyone at all, I would only ask this - who is that person? To which group do you believe they belong? Are they one of these 'nuclear physicist' level intellects? Do they perhaps know one of those people? If not, then don't do it. Why would you do that? How would it possibly help them?

The only point is to find these few, to empower and inform them, and then to simply watch as the whole thing begins to unfold. The very last thing we want is for a whole bunch of children to begin storming onto the field, making a whole lot of noise, asking all manner of stupid questions, and basically just screwing the whole thing up.

And yet, the whole idea that we are going to be able to do all of this without any broader public knowledge is perhaps a bit optimistic, so what can anyone do if they do end up becoming aware of this framework and the potentials it indicates, and if they want to help, but if they don't really know how?

For the most part, probably the best thing you can do is to simply stay out of the way. If you do happen to know someone who might realistically qualify at that highest level, then yes - feel free to pass this on to them. Upwards, always upwards. But if not, then just keep it to yourself.

2EQ is not a philosophy to be openly propagated. It is not a movement. It is not even an 'idea worth sharing', so there will never be a TED talk about it, at least not prior to that great practical cascade. It is only a transformative potential to be directly made available to people - a real life event that will profoundly shift a person's most fundamental state in a way they didn't even know was possible. And yes, once that has occurred for them, they might naturally be interested to know what happened to them, and what it all means - but that is afterwards. To have that information delivered before that event would only be toxic and inflammatory. That would actually be detrimental.

This is why there is such a strong message here about who this is not for in the first instance. It is because of the way simple minds will tend to perceive all of this, based especially on what they are accustomed to, and how they think about things. All they see is that it is exciting, and that the answer must therefore be to stand up and shout about it. The idea for them is immediately to see the whole thing in terms of as many people as possible, and in terms of all of that being very loud, and very public. But this is adolescent and naive in this instance, and misses the entire message. The only important target audience here in the first instance is a tiny group of people, and all in private. You won't even see it happening, not unless you happen to be participating at that level directly.

The eventual outcome of that private event will indeed be a very big public event, but by that stage it will not be theoretical in any sense. You will simply be able to pop your prickly ball inside out - and please pay here! It might even be very painful, at first anyway, until the entire thing becomes more developed and refined, or before AI takes the whole thing over. But the significance of the outcome state will still make it an overwhelming proposition.

So if you would like to 'give 2EQ' to anyone, then give them the practice, not the theory. Do not deliver the anatomy of the prickly ball - deliver to them the process that can turn it inside out, accessibly, and reliably, every time.

And what does that mean? It means supporting those brave and intelligent few who will ultimately make that process available to you in practice, rather than spreading the whole thing wildly in theory, in any sort of indiscriminate way.

Of course, if anyone thinks they might actually qualify, then they can be in touch. We will be able to help them, and at least connect them to others who share similar interests and abilities. But if not, then just stay quiet - and put that energy where it matters.

So yes, if you know one of these people, then do whatever you can to support them. But if you don't think that's you, and if you also don't know anyone, but if you have nevertheless stumbled upon this somehow and see what it all might mean - then I guess just donate to it. There really isn't anything else the average person can do in this situation.

But hopefully nobody will ever give some 2EQ primer to their kids, thinking that it might allay some of their teenage angst and confusion. It's just not that sort of thing. Unless they happen to be an absolute genius, that will only confuse them further, and take them nowhere at all.

This is not a joke. In order to solve the deepest core of suffering and dread people everywhere are struggling with, just a few people are going to need to go in there and figure it all out, so that nobody else will need to do that. The whole point is to avoid people needing to become directly aware of all that stuff, not to push that in anyone's face. So if you do find yourself really into all of this, but not really sure what you might do to help, then just penetrate it more deeply in yourself, rather than spreading it more widely.

These two things tend to be at opposite ends of the spectrum actually, with people spreading more widely only in order to avoid penetrating it more deeply in themselves. So that is the game. Do the work.

This is why you should never just get all excited like a puppy and spray this all over your social network. It is because you can't eat the recipe, and because no individual is going to be able to cook this particular meal. So just support the chefs, and your kids will be fed in due course, along with you, your friends, and everyone else. Just do that, and all the rest will work out fine. Buy a book and keep it to yourself. Donate, and don't tell anyone.

What really needs to happen next is already being done - by the only people qualified to do it. But if you really must talk about it with someone, make sure it is always the very smartest person you know, and all in the hope that they will do the same. But for the most part just keep the whole thing on the downlow, and wait for the big wave to arrive.

•

I mean, does the resulting pathway make sense to you? Is it clear that we are only speaking about very few people being deeply informed, and all entirely in private? That there is a small upstream aspect, and a big downstream effect? That by the time it reaches the really big downstream stage that it will no longer be a case of 'belief then transformation' as we usually tend to see, but 'transformation then belief'? And that each stage or step in the entire sequence is distinct and separate, and can thereby be split up into a chain of isolated events?

Is it clear what the next link would be here, and that nothing else would be required of those who participate in that? It seems absurd, and maybe it is, but it really is just a missing map of sorts, one that now only needs to be placed in front of people who are not blind. And that will be the start of the entire game.

Ultimately, what we see emerging here is a situation that echoes Margaret Mead when she said -

“Never doubt that a small group of thoughtful committed individuals can change the world. In fact, it's the only thing that ever has”

In this sense, and especially when you bring the entire cascade right back to its current triggering threshold, the entire possibility we are talking about really is at another whole level when you consider the sort of brute force impact it will have once the applications are unleashed, the depth of the shift in the individual, and how powerfully it will propagate. And then to place all of that within the reach of just the few who dare to take that first look? It is completely unprecedented, and all of that merely by seeding the possibility for anyone who hungers to finally understand the core structure of our suffering, which in the end was the only missing part. Really, nobody is even looking in the right direction, and even those who are don't see this.

So yes, this is obviously an impossible stretch in the first instance. To somehow marry these two in your own mind - how small the fuse is, compared to how big the dynamite. But really, merely by taking a closer look, those first few will be making that entire territory accessible to anyone who decides to follow along, and - as we saw - that is the real point. In becoming aware of the detailed anatomy for the first time, and at the right level, they will immediately provide the same awareness to countless others. In gaining personal understanding, others will understand also, as they travel along in their pocket, so to speak.

This is the power of that tiny initiating trigger. The aim in that case would not be to produce anything for public consumption, or even able to be understood by the average person. The only purpose would be to allow for constructive dialogue to occur at the right level, and also for it to spread at that strictly private level.

Therefore, the whole thing is currently edging up to a sort of critical transition moment, where the demands will be more narrow and specific, but later on the whole thing will relax a lot more, and eventually the floodgates will open completely. But in the short term, as I say, we are approaching a tight moment, a sort of bottleneck in a sense, where the requirements will be most extreme.

These particular demands, and all the associated conditions, are very likely the reason why none of this has happened before, so no doubt there will be a few hidden booby traps, but that's why we are going to be selecting people with such stringent criteria in the first instance. Therefore, it all depends on your own particular strengths and interests, as well as the stage you are entering it at.

So when we talk about exclusion, this is all we mean. We are defining a very particular kind of arena that is really only suited to a very particular type of person.

Just to be clear, then - what we see here is the essential threshold between the old world and the new, as defined by the very top domino in that associated cascade. It is the final tipping point, the tiny fuse that inevitably leads to the big dynamite, the one essential thing that needs to happen in order to have exited the old state, and entered the new. The package will then have been delivered, and at that very moment we will already be living in the new world. The old world will then be liberated - not immediately, but inevitably. The great fire will then have been lit, and with every passing day it will spiral and grow, meaning that it will then only be a matter of time.

There will then be no stopping it. So in some essential sense we can then all relax, secure in the knowledge that it has now become the dominant outcome state, and also becoming more and more established with every passing day. And for all of that, the only thing missing now is what we have now indicated so very clearly - for the right information to be made available to the right people in the right form. It is also information I am prepared to offer freely - but not to just anyone. That was the mistake I always made. So there are now very clear criteria associated, and I suppose that's what we have been getting at here.

You could hammer away at this pyramid for a million years, but unless you were working right up at that very top level, nothing significant would ever happen. Indeed, at any level lower than that, the overall outcome would probably only be detrimental. And it turns out that this highest level has very definable characteristics, making anyone not quite suitable quite easy to identify.

This is the rock that I crashed against for years on end, until my entire life had become a shipwreck, and all because I failed to figure out this one very basic truth - that I only needed to be a little more selective about who I was speaking to. And I know I keep saying it, but it is just so very deeply against my own nature that I need to literally force myself to uphold this boundary.

So ultimately this pending release of pressure has not been the result of relenting. I did not capitulate. It has not been the result of relaxing and lowering my standards, but quite the opposite. It has been the result of finally accepting that some people really aren't worth talking to, and simply letting that entire level of life go. At least in the immediate short term, as we cross this first threshold. The standards in this case are not set by me, they are set by the event itself, and there is really no way to relax about something this big, not when the whole thing appears to still be resting entirely on the results of my own actions. Which means this diet of elimination will need to start off very extreme in the first instance, and will only relax as the demands associated begin to wane over time.

In any case, we are currently setting about to have a series of such chats here, in order to begin refining this essential process of 'capture' being referred to, with a view to eventually being able to nutshell that process in some reliable form, as indicated.

That type of chat is quite different to what we will be doing tomorrow by the way, where the entire structure is laid out. What we will be doing there is delivering all the engine parts, which for some people will be enough - if they are a mechanic, so to speak. But for most people it seems they need a separate session where they get help to put it all together correctly.

•

So what was the key? In the end this issue is overcome entirely by the establishment of this special context, and the resulting separation of people into two different groups at any moment, as indicated. Basically, for anyone who has embraced the obvious imperatives of this emerging view, having access to some version of this inverted cultural context will become necessary, even if it is for only an hour per week, or on their phone. And accessing that space will be like coming up for air.

This clear cultural boundary is not something that needs to be crossed over just once, but many times, merely as and when desired. So adding this possibility to common culture is a bit like having a sauna installed in your home - you don't stay in there all day. But you also don't leave the door open and let all the heat out.

Therefore, the very obvious solution to keeping the two events complementary, rather than conflicting, is functional separation - like fire being kept in a firebox.

The fire that is emerging here is vital to our survival, it is critically useful in this context, but only if it can be adequately contained and intentionally directed by qualified experts. But you also don't want to have random people spilling water on it constantly, which is what common culture will tend to do. That is what the cultural boundary avoids, and why the standards associated are so important to uphold.

Which is to say - ultimately, there is no 2EQ for dummies. Just like there is no nuclear physics for dummies. Not at what we might call the 'wholesale' or 'producer' level, which is really the only part that matters in the first instance. There really would be no point to that sort of pedestrian version at a purely theoretical level, except perhaps to use that level of audience to empower another level again, or to support those few in some way as they set about the much more difficult and demanding task of making it practically accessible to everyone.

In the end it has all brought a single defining fact to the foreground, something I had never even considered until recently, and something we were never going to discover until all other factors were in place. There was one final number required in order to make this a winning ticket, so to speak. And in that regard the purpose here was just to clarify a singular injunction, a maxim that has become the very essence of the game now -

Never wait. And never knock twice.

Basically, if something isn't working, don't hang around. Just move on to greener pastures, immediately.

That's all I would say - never imagine that people will rise to the game later, because they never do. Anyone who is ready for this is always basically ready immediately, so if they are not, then that is really all you need to know. Nobody truly qualified will make you wait, or need you to knock twice, and only truly qualified people matter in this instance.

It's funny actually, I heard a hilarious meme today, where an old lady was sharing her wisdom about true love -

“Love is like a fart - if you have to force it, then it's probably shit.”

This seems like the same basic sentiment. If it's not right immediately, then it's probably not right. And our task here now will only be to select people, not to rehabilitate them. That doesn't work with love, and apparently it doesn't work here either. So all we can do is set the bar, and look out for anyone who is clearly able to jump it.

I mention all of this not only because it is the summary lesson I learned, and at such a great cost, but also because many others may well be in the same situation before long, if all this information makes its way out into the wild. They might find themselves wanting to speak to people about it, without really understanding that what might have become so natural for them may still be extremely disturbing for anyone who is not quite as robust.

These days, therefore, if it's not absolutely what someone is into, and if they are not prepared to send the ball back over the net at every progressive stage without reservation, then hey - no hard feelings, see you later. Plenty of fish in the sea etc. Nobody is being forced to do anything they are not absolutely into. So if you are not, then that is all you need to know.

So that would be my only advice to anyone -

If you do take a closer look, and if it's not exactly what you are into, what you have been looking for your entire life, and if you are not completely ready to jump into it, boots and all, then please - just walk on by.

There is no longer time for that sort of lukewarm nonsense here. We are not saying that anyone should want to change the world, in their own lifetime, we are only saying that this might actually be possible. So it is only an opportunity for those who do happen to be into that sort of thing. Each to their own, etc.

This is the singular function of the emerging cultural context here, where we are opening up the deep end at last. It is all about eliminating anything that doesn't float. That is the entire purpose of the bar we are raising here. So if you don't show up with what it actually takes, then you probably won't last very long, and relentlessly upholding this minimum standard will be the whole reason that those who do qualify will want to hang around.

That is the purpose of making this information bundle available in this way, even though it might only be somewhat rough and unedited. It doesn't really matter, not for anyone who actually qualifies. For them, all of that noise won't matter in the least. You certainly won't need to somehow instill the appropriate degree of urgency or seriousness into their actions. Really, if people don't pretty much see it immediately, then they probably aren't going to see it at all.

Therefore, this is the one thing we have finally learned here. The layers of the pyramid we are talking about here cannot be adjusted. This was the nightmare we have just woken up from after decades of tortured failure.

The event we are discussing here erodes functional capacities, leaving people in various states of disarray. And yet, a few remain standing. So you can only select for it, not modify it, at least not based on any kind of external stimulus. The factors that altogether go into producing these various levels of competency are far too deeply rooted to be manipulated in any significant way, not without very serious willpower and commitment from those involved. So they are basically fixed realities. And including anyone at any stage who does not clearly demonstrate the associated characteristics at every ongoing point would clearly be reprehensible given all that is on the line in this case.

My point in all of this is just to say that we are only inches away from ignition here now, and that this most rare of combinations is what might start to be discovered before too long here - the proverbial unicorn in this emerging arena - people who are both interested as well as qualified. And I certainly didn't expect the latter in your case, this is just a couple of mates chewing the fat, although I have no doubt that they are out there. It might even take only one, at just the right level, in order to ignite the entire bundle now. This is the experiment we are about to undertake, so I guess we will see. Watch this space.

Anyway, this has been a long journey, so maybe we could step back again and recap this entire thing as we come to the end of all this -

What is it that I am saying, that nobody else is saying? What is it, essentially, that needs to be captured and delivered into the world? What is it that might be lost if I died today, or if I simply decided to drop this whole thing? What is the thing nobody else would find?

It is a map of sorts, as indicated, in particular one that captures just the right amount in just the right detail to enable development toward the achievement of one very important outcome - that being the possibility of a kind of unequivocal relinquishment in every person of an equally unambiguous negative event. So it is not just an idea in this other sense, it is a real experiential event - a structural and energetic shift into a new stable state.

The map is merely an arrow that is pointing to something, but the thing it is pointing to is not a map, it is a real thing in the real world. And this is why we say that 2EQ is not a philosophy.

This is the key insight here - the essential possibility being indicated is actually an energetic equilibrium, a structural reality, rather than any of the downstream things people wrongly associate with it. In particular, that it is the summary removal of an integrated singularity, and that the important anatomy associated has been entirely overlooked - it is not currently available anywhere. And also, that the essential factors that define the shift to this other equilibrium can be known, along with things that either promote or obstruct that transition.

Therefore, what we see is a chance for just a few brave people to ignite a process that will change the entire world, in their own lifetimes. The only thing that has prevented this happening before is that we didn't even know it was there. But once that very first line is crossed, there will be no going back, and what was previously impossible for the average person will eventually become commonplace. The release of this inner conflict will become both deeply understood and widely available, it will sweep through the world like a tsunami of individual liberation, and with that the very foundations of civilization will also change. There will be no stopping it, and the results will be both effortless and permanent.

That, then, is the way out of our situation. More importantly, it is the only way out. There are no other exits available here, as defined by the nature of the situation and the anatomy associated. If this hidden issue remains in place, both stable and active, then almost all of our deepest problems in life - both individually and collective - will forever continue to plague us. It is the singular root cause, and it can be removed.

So why would we not do that? What am I missing here?

This emerging roadmap is therefore inimitable, in that it thereby opens the way for the development of interventions that will eventually make that hidden energetic transition available to all people, allowing for a cascading wildfire of personal transformation, and eventually the foundations of an entirely different world. It is not just a philosophy, as I say, and the aim of it is not to change your mind. The singular important potential it points to is far deeper than that, and achieving that will require no intellectual engagement whatsoever. People will not need to know how it works, or even what has happened to them. Although they might obviously be interested, but only after the fact.

And this is what makes it different, and also important. It is not only the depth and nature of the possibility being indicated, but the fact that it stands to be made available at a level accessible to even the simplest of minds, and the weakest of wills.

I mean, we just finished saying above that there is no 2EQ for dummies, but in that context we were only speaking about those few who will ignite all of this. In the downstream sense, dummies are what 2EQ is all about. That is sort of the whole point of it, and what makes it powerful.

For those few at the top end, at the giving end of all this rather than the receiving end, the emotional undercurrent can be very demanding. It requires a powerful emotional stance, the same kind that surgeons and pilots will often require, a capacity for which they are tested during training. There is a certain kind of detached but benevolent focus that paradoxically cannot afford to care too much in the small personal sense, whilst delivering far greater care in a far wider context. It is very disciplined in this sense, and this is why it is only for those who understand the reason for the necessary exclusion of most people from that small bounded event.

You really do need to understand that people really don't know what's good for them in this context, and that the highest possible form of love will - if all you deliver is theory - be perceived as the deepest possible attack. And this is why, at least until the practical applications emerge in due course, we so clearly need to separate the calm and rational doctors from all the struggling and screaming babies. In theory it is all as bitter as hell, but in practice it will be sweet like sugar. So when anyone is excluded in the first instance for their own good, that's all we are really saying - the restaurant isn't open yet, not unless you happen to be a very good chef. So just come back later!

Therefore, nothing else is this. Nobody is gradually creeping up on it. Nobody is even looking in the right direction, as far as I know. So this is all coming out of the blue, so to speak. Most people don't know that this other state even exists, let alone what defines it. And those who do know tend to have completely misunderstood its true nature, which leads those who find it to have no way to reliably repeat that transition in others.

So this concealed anatomy stands to open the floodgates the moment it is made available to the few who are capable of confidently grappling with such complex and inherently challenging material. And this is what makes it important. It's like having the GPS coordinates for a buried city - a city full of treasure. It was all merely concealed, and not only passively, but actively covered up at every point by the roaring torrent of denial and avoidance we call common culture, which in turn generates a kind of back-pressure that prevents open dissemination of this very insight in any naturally propagating way.

So this is how we might summarise the entire situation -

- The event itself is inimitable. This will be immediately evident the moment anyone crosses this threshold. And this is how it is very easy to see that this has not yet been achieved in the world at this time. It will not be possible to miss it. It is even feasible that someone might come up with some sort of practical intervention that achieves this transition in some people with a degree of reliability, without knowing how it really works in any robust sense, but that would be unlikely at any really effective level. I mean all you would basically get in that instance is - Buddhism. So most likely what we will see is that any first evidence of this cascading realisation will be accompanied by - as well as driven by, and explained by - a supporting theoretical framework that makes sense of what is actually going on. And in this case what is actually going on really only has one clear definition. Sort of like the way commercial airliners are made - there are not many different theories, and they don't just crash hundreds of them in order to develop more effective or efficient forms. Instead of that, they have the universally accepted scientific field of aeronautics to stand upon, and are thereby able to model and develop the entire thing in theory - frameworks of understanding that are so robust, and so accurate, that they never need to test fly anything before it goes into production. They already know exactly what's going on, and exactly how it is going to perform.
- It is on one hand a practice, then, one that is able to reliably repeat this particular transition in any typical person. But it is also a theory, one that not only has the power to increasingly enable the development of better practice, thereby confirming its own veracity, but that can also - and just as importantly from a cultural perspective - explain what has occurred. Typical references to this same individual potential in current culture are neither of these things - they neither make it reliably accessible, nor explain it in any rational manner. Instead, they all tend to reach for all manner of mystical bullshit in terms of theory, in order to do everything they can to cover up the fact that they don't actually deliver it in practice. So the important combination is missing at both ends in that case. And the typical result of this failure is that these 'spiritualised' approaches eventually tend to shift blame onto the adherent for simply not being 'serious' enough etc, when actually they simply don't know what they are talking about. And once again, this historical failure is what will become clear the moment it actually begins, and that we only put up with that rubbish because we didn't know anything better was even available. It is.
- Therefore, this elementary theory (the particular terms and minimum capture) is what defines the necessary precondition associated with the formation of any cultural event that will first deliver this proof of concept, and thereby spark the great cascade of development that will follow. So it is this map that matters, and this is what needs to be very clearly laid out within that first process of dialogue. We just need to lay the entire thing out on the table, and in sufficient detail, for everyone to see. Then we need to poke it, and push it, to make sure it's all basically correct, just as you would with any other scientific claim.

- In terms of who might be associated with that event, those with the 'right stuff' in this context are those who have grasped this fact of inimitability with equally unambiguous clarity, regardless of whether they are qualified for direct participation at the particular stage they are first arriving at. To be on the team is simply to know what's at stake, and to do whatever you can, even if that isn't much. But the only really important thing is clearly within the reach of everyone, and we have now defined that in as much clarity as we might ever possibly need - to just break the silence and chat about it in some sort of ongoing way.

The main point is that nothing else is even coming close to this. There is nothing else that you might possibly fix that will fix this upstream issue, and leaving this one untouched will ultimately mean that no other solution has any lasting impact. On the other hand, fixing this will address almost all of those other issues by implication, given that they are all ultimately rooted in - or affected by - this underlying issue. But this is not going to emerge anywhere else. As I say. Not ever. And the reason I keep saying that is because it could all still be lost at this point, if there is nobody there to catch this ball. It was found here by accident in a sense, like winning the lotto three times in a row - the chances of that ever happening again are slim to the point of being pretty much non-existent. Nobody would ever live to tell the tale. Believe me.

This is what we indicated in relation to the law of the unstable middle, what a transition between two equilibriums feels like, and how the current threshold is the most extreme version ever. To be up on one of these hills is basically torture, and to stay there for too long will always be your undoing.

And this is also why I took so much time in the addendum to indicate my own situation at this highest peak of tension - it is because all of the remaining information you will require has yet to come from me personally, and there is no fucking oxygen at this current altitude! So you really need to get your shit together if any of this sounds even remotely interesting, because if you don't then it will all be lost.

My end of this current transition is only half of the story in this sense, like the runway this aeroplane needs to take off from - the other half is the runway at the destination end. This is what we have been focusing on here I suppose. For lots of people it just won't land, not ever. And this is really worth knowing. It might even be the most important single fact about the whole thing, at least at this critical moment.

It was always going to take a very particular person to be able to throw a ball this fast, but here was the bit I always overlooked - it was also going to take someone at the same basic level in order to catch a ball that fast. Really, forget catching it, apparently this ball is moving so fast that most people can't even see it.

The foundation we are left with, then, is a stark contrast to all of the 'paths to happiness' currently being taken, no matter how well meaning they might be. Even those elements of culture that have correctly captured some aspect of downstream 'healing' have failed to fully fathom the nature of this upstream cause. And every path defined by what feels good, or that leads to any kind of balanced life, will always lead away from the final insight in this regard. It was hidden right at the bottom of the pit.

In the end, the only true and ultimate trigger for the emancipation we are seeking as a civilisation was hidden in the one place nobody would ever look, and getting hold of that was always going to be a path directly into a kind of personal hell. And this is what I meant in the preface when I said that understanding my own connection at this moment is critical - it is because missing this aspect is to fail to grasp the overall scale of the events being indicated, and what crossing that threshold was always going to take - not only from me, but also from you.

•

So anyway mate, that's it. Quite a ride. That was my own answer to the question posed here right at the start. And hopefully that was a bit of an adventure for you. Food for thought etc. There is no obligation to go any further here, or to do anything else at all. This was already a valuable distraction at my end due to the way it always narrows my focus down to speak to anyone directly. That has really been the only thing missing for a very long time - the complete social vacuum that is generated by the very thing that was discovered. Now we only need to start doing that with the right people, at the right level, and the real game will suddenly begin.

Therefore, you can now choose where this goes from here, in your own case. It can go nowhere at all beyond this point, and of course that's totally fine. But you could - given that you do know me - decide to take a bit more of a journey here, and unpack the whole thing in more depth and detail, perhaps even becoming an expert along the way. Although I don't expect you will.

That 'tipping point' conversation will be found soon enough here in any case, as we edge our way up to this looming precipice. I have other meetings coming up, and in some cases with people who appear on the surface to be eminently qualified. So they will only need to be interested enough, and that will be ignition reached.

It will take just a few at first, bashing through rough and rugged terrain for the first time, but ultimately there will be 8 lane highways that are named after those initial few. What we see is a huge collective transformation, and all teetering on a tiny fulcrum, the smallest of events really, with just the right bit of information required in order to set the whole thing alight.

Imagine being part of something that big. In some ways it is the ultimate adventure. And yet, I know all too well why anyone might not want to. I have had many opportunities to wish that I didn't know it, if only because it forces you to confront people with something they are really unprepared to look at. As I said above - it makes people seem weak, and cowardly, and stupid, and believe me that's not a good place to be. Something this bright casts some very dark shadows.

So on the one hand if I never had to speak to another person about any of this I would be a very happy guy. But no doubt that is itself just a symptom of not having been speaking to the right people, in the right context, which is where we seem to be coming to now. That experience, when the ball is suddenly rolling away freely, as we all run after it together, might be quite the opposite of what it has been like pushing it up this hill for so many years on my own.

Of course, the entire thing is so epic that it boggles the mind, a completely different future for humanity as a whole. Sorry about that. How ridiculous it all seems. I do get that. And all of that now hangs on this shift from individual to collective for the first time, which will ultimately occur in a single conversation, in a single place, on a single day. But it is what it is, that is simply where it has all come to, and it only looks like this because I happen to be sitting here writing about it at this very moment of transition. So this is a 'postcard from the edge' as they say, and we won't be hanging around here long. There just needs to be the right conversation now, with the right person, and the whole bundle will begin to unravel. We already know what that conversation is, so the only thing we need now is the right person to have it with.

So it is literally within your power at this point to change the entire world. I mean, you personally. We only need to find that person. Just once. But yes, that's not everyone - the initial few will need to be smart, and brave, and be prepared to act on what they see - and in particular to fight for what is right in the face of real and pervasive suffering at the widest and deepest possible level.

Of course not everyone is ready for such a profound consideration, nor the path associated. Not everyone is here to serve, and for those of us who are, this can be very easy to forget. Some people are just having fun, that is literally what their whole life is all about. Personally, I can't even imagine that. How shallow and inane that must be. But each to their own I guess.

Most people will take one look and run for the hills, and maybe they are the sane ones. But then there will be an insane few who will jump at the chance to bring this house of cards down once and for all, to be part of something that changes everything, for everyone, everywhere. And it is those crazy bastards that we are aiming for here now I suppose. You only get one shot at this life, so you might as well burn bright!

And that is the final lesson here perhaps, as confirmed so many times along the way here -

This is not for everyone. Not at first. So nobody is being pushed.

Nobody should ever be shaken awake twice. If someone is ready to wake up they will open their eyes immediately. But if they aren't then you really should let them go on back to sleep.

In the end it is only an invitation to the brave, and the right people will never need to be told twice. This will simply be what they have been waiting for, and they will always recognise it immediately.

APPENDIX

'Capture'

Well mate, here we are with a bit of an update. When I first wrote this document it took about four days, and by the time I got to the end section I was a bit spent, so it just sort of wandered off into rambling in that first draft, and never really came together fully. As you may remember.

I have since come back to replace that whole end section a few times with various more concise summaries, but nothing that really fits the purpose for which this was written.

However, since then various things have happened to clarify further the really important thing to pull forward here. In particular, we have once more confirmed the need for this 'capture' to be achieved by anyone before they get too far into all of this, and the rather dire consequences of skipping over that elementary foundation.

With this in mind, the front page of the website has now been formatted so as to much more clearly pin down this one condition of entry, if only because there has never been a single exception at this point. People who have that 'orientation' chat get it - people who don't talk don't. So what can we do but make it a rule?

However, and firmly in keeping with not believing in rules at all, we will do what we can to violate this dictum here by giving it a crack in written form - at least briefly. After all whilst we did chat for a bit back there, we never did seek to tie the bow in this sense, so as to check how deeply the implications had landed for you.

So just in case that interests you, we will now set about the task of building this engine for you here, just to see if we might be able to use all the various bits we have collected above, and maybe get it going. We can put all of this together, just to spell the whole thing out very clearly, and in a way that you really shouldn't be able to miss. We can see where the whole thing leads, and just how fast it might get there.

Just be aware, however, this might be a train wreck. I don't necessarily expect this will work for you (if it did then that would be a first!) but sooner or later we will probably be able to achieve that 'capture' In this much more difficult written format.

You should also be aware that this will all be information you already have. There will basically be nothing new here, it's just that nobody ever does the intellectual work associated with putting it all together in this way. That was always my resistance - it always seemed dangerous to lower the bar in this way if what we really need here are people who can do high jump.

In any case, you are just a mate, and almost certainly not one of those elite high flyers being indicated, so we will just lay it all out for you, so that at least you can walk away with some sense of what it all really means.

We can start with a recap of the basic anatomy -

What we see is a broad framework that fits with everything we currently understand about human life from a scientific vantage point - a kind of 'origin story' that encompasses the obvious fact of evolution as we understand it, but also a story that accounts for the somewhat enigmatic differences between ourselves and other animals. There were clearly a few recent advancements that caused some major leaps for us, but that also produced some unforeseen issues.

The important aspects of our anatomy that matter in this instance are hopefully pulled forward there in sufficient resolution to be able to construct the essential scaffolding of what has occurred. In books like Organic Psychology we see all of this in a lot more detail, but we can at least sketch the outlines here.

First we see three basic levels of organic life - body, emotions, and mind. The basic hierarchy of existence in our own case. Within this we see three basic emotional functions that manage the shifting allocation of attachment and energy, thereby maintaining the fulfilment of need over time - anger, grief, fear. So that is basic motivation in a nutshell.

Alongside this we see an equal investment of energy being put into information processing. After all there is no point being able to move if you don't know which direction. And for that, we need to see what is going on around us, not only in space, but also in time.

Navigation of change requires time awareness - resulting ultimately in the production of an extended simulation of what we might call 'secondary reality', so as to augment and supplement our direct and very limited actual perceptions in the present moment. Hence, we come to live in two different realities at once, fused together, and in many ways both experienced as being entirely real - although one is only a fabrication of our own mind. We are only meant to experience that fabricated augmentation as being real emotionally, so that it will motivate us accordingly - that being its very purpose after all. But it is not actually real.

Various repressive capacities have also been vital to our survival over time. For instance we can contain and delay emotional processes, sort of like holding our breath in a sense, and this can in many cases have profound benefits - it can allow you to fight the tiger now, and cry later about being bitten, for instance. If you cry now, you won't need to cry later, because you will be lunch, etc.

Primary to the way we have come to operate in this sense, this ability to withstand a degree of 'compression' is basic to our ability to manage the flow of change over time - with a higher capacity in this regard generally conferring higher creative outcomes. We see this in a million different subtle and gross forms, but essentially any time you delay gratification in the present moment in favour of a better outcome in the future, or sacrifice a gain for yourself in order to deliver a gain for another, you will encounter this structural loading - what we will often refer to as 'stress'. Therefore, your ability to manage and intentionally generate this type of compression, especially in relation to the secure realisation of significant outcomes, is essentially what defines how intelligent and creative you are as a person. And we will come back to this aspect shortly when we see how these 'compression tanks' have, for most people, been filled up with something else entirely, something dangerous, basically rendering people safe as a result, but also powerless, not to mention stupid.

In the construction of our 'secondary reality' augmentation, certain errors were always going to be inevitable, and in our own case one error was to populate our imaginary realm with an imaginary self, and then to believe that this puppet is a real literal fact of existence, when actually it is just a fabrication of mind. But essentially this is all healthy and natural, just part of how such a navigational system might work. The problem with this, however, is when this ultimately 'unreal' sense of separate self meets the very real inevitability of physical death. The result of this is a functional deadlock that requires deep and permanent containment in order to keep going forwards with any kind of stable equanimity. This produces a second body of activity within the motive core that then needs to run alongside the primary functional agenda, a second unconscious agenda essentially, and the main purpose of this agenda is to forever prevent this 'crisis' from ever emerging again.

In particular, the main activity of this added event is concealment - the aim is to keep the whole underlying crisis away from conscious awareness, by any means possible. And there turns out to be many ways this might be achieved, hence the huge variation we see in individual human psychology. This is why.

The result of all of this is a very particular pattern of functioning at a core level, and an equally mysterious pattern of experience at a subjective level. Most especially, this whole situation offers very little opportunity to ever get to the bottom of what is going on from a conscious standpoint - either individually or culturally.

First of all, what we see is the function of the event itself, which is to remain hidden from view. This is not just what it does, but what it is. After all, it can hardly sit there screaming "hello - hiding something here!" Not if it wants to keep hiding it.

On top of this, the powerful and very dynamic behavioural and emotional tendencies associated with all of this subversive activity end up producing so much confusion that discerning the natural underlying functioning from this added body of activity becomes almost impossible by the time all of that is expressed at the surface level. And the result of this is that these two events have never been functionally differentiated in any meaningful way, adding another level of blind concealment.

And then, on top of this again, all of this aversion and denial is then projected outwards into the collective in the form of common culture, where once again the very powerful effect is to assist the individual in perpetually moving away from becoming aware of all this underlying turmoil.

Essentially, this becomes the ultimate puzzle to solve, leaving the key to all of it - the anatomy associated - forever resting beyond reach of the collective, which alone has the power to apply such knowledge in real transformational terms.

Therefore, we see two distinct levels of this subversive agenda in typical (unconscious) psychology - the core level, and the containments. The core level is pretty much universal in form, with few obvious variations except where the formation of 'self' might vary, as with a few primitive tribes. But essentially this part is common amongst all people. The containments, however, vary enormously, and are also extremely dynamic in form and combination. The various options available are actually defined by the anatomy of the system itself.

The resulting functional and emotional distortions are merely byproducts of this concealment activity, or - in rare cases - the re-emergence of the primary crisis at the root. We generally call that madness, but really we are all mad in that sense, with what we call sanity merely being a form of avoidance that we agree to have in common with those around us. But we are all on fire in this sense, at the core, below all the sanitising bullshit.

This variation in containment also represents problems when it comes to the possibility of rooting all of this subversive activity out, as we will see below, because it means there can be no universal path in that sense. Every person has basically made a slightly different kind of mess in the kitchen, so cleaning it up is always a little bit unique in every case.

Clearly, it is a very dynamic picture, especially given the most obvious fact at the base of all of this - which is that we are not consciously aware that any of this is even occurring. We feel the impact of it, but we just can't see the cause. We suffer from all manner of impulses and tendencies over time that we might not understand, but we can't really overcome them in most cases - and even if we do they are generally only replaced by some other tendency that is even worse, and just as mysterious.

The detailed anatomy of this situation is what 2EQ is all about. Once you see the basic structure of the system as a whole, along with what this subversive activity is seeking to achieve, all the various possible manipulations become quite obvious. And the result of that is a model that comprehensively defines the dynamically conflicted common state - a situation that is dramatically out of alignment with what we have every right to biologically expect.

But as indicated above, no matter which pattern of containment happens to be adopted at any moment, the first system to take the load is our ability to 'suspend deep emotional processes'.

Our 'compression tanks' fill up with half finished business so to speak, with life then becoming like trying to eat a meal when you already have a half chewed lump in the corner of your mouth. And this is why people everywhere suffer such deep levels of stress, but at the same time have nothing creative to show for it. Their creative capacity for powerful change management is essentially being consumed by the containment of this deeper crisis, in a kind of emotional constipation.

At another level, what we see is very deep corruption of mental and cognitive faculties as this same unconscious agenda seeks to undermine death awareness by either degrading our appreciation of future probabilities (essentially making us stupid - given that this is what intelligence means) and/or by manufacturing false future narratives that include some kind of immortality aspect (thereby effectively making us psychotic). The collective form of such intentional mental corruption is called 'religion'.

We could go on, but if you want all the details you can go and see any of the works associated.

The point is that what we end up with is a completely distorted picture of what 'normal' existence in the universe should naturally feel like, thus leading us to question everything. But this is the point - this is not 'normal' at all. Our birthright was taken, but no matter what we do, or where we look, we just can't see what happened. We remain completely blind to the single most important fact of our existence, if only because that very fact is itself a form of very active existential blindness.

On this foundation we can now build the picture we are all interested in -

The individual person is essentially trapped. No matter which way you slice it, this is simply not the life they imagined for themselves, and no matter which moves they make they just don't seem to be able to change that fact. So what difference does this emerging anatomy make to this picture?

First of all the detailed anatomical model provides a very deep explanation of the typical state, and in doing so offers a great deal of both consolation and empowerment. It is a liberation in many ways just to see what is really going on at last, and to meet your true enemy in this sense.

Especially, and once you see just how dramatic and formidable it really is, a degree of compassion returns, and not only for others, but especially for yourself. There really is no beating anything this powerful and slippery, not in a direct confrontation. It is indeed possible to outsmart it, but only once you see what is really going on, which means penetrating the whole thing in a way that will obviously involve blowing away all of the subtle blindness associated. But yes, that is possible - to train the tiger so to speak. Direct transcendence of the issue through direct personal understanding - the 'path of understanding' as 2EQ would define such - is a real thing. But it is not cheap. This is very complex territory, and also not for the faint hearted. We are essentially talking about the darkest of all places you might visit, from a psychological and emotional standpoint - the pits of hell, etc. You would need to be very smart for that path, and very strong.

Therefore, if that is not the path being suggested, then what?

The key fact, as we have already discussed above, is the possibility of this entire edifice being summarily removed, and what that might mean for any individual. And once again, this is something that the emerging anatomy provides for.

For the first time what we see here is a level of detail that is complete enough, and dynamic enough, to provide a clear path towards a definable release threshold.

The framework associated also defines this release as being quite unequivocal, not transient, based on the event itself being singular and discrete. It is not the pruning of this bush - it is a ripping out by the roots.

Gone. Forever. Once.

This singularity is captured in the central principle of 2EQ - that being the basic idea that the dynamic stability of this underlying event will always just accommodate any transient change by displacing pressure into various other limbs of the overall structure, a pent up loading that will then simply return over time to the same basic state, or something worse, or something different, but ultimately just as bad.

Therefore, there would be no point to just throw a single limb of this octopus over that lip between bowls, as meditation does etc. You can stop the mind, sure, but it will just start up again immediately. And this is because the core event is not only in the mind. In many ways it is in the mind least of all - that is only the very small visible tip of a far bigger iceberg of energetic disturbance.

So this is the key here - the summary insight is that there is no stable transformation short of the centre of gravity of this event being passed across this threshold. All of that shallow or partial leverage is only transient, and essentially futile. That sort of thing is not only nothing, it is worse than nothing in many instances, because it needlessly wastes energy on pointless actions that lead nowhere ultimately but right back to where you began. So yes, hey, if you like meditating - then meditate. I like snowboarding. Each to their own. Just don't imagine that they are different in any fundamental sense, not relative to the possibility of this far more radical release.

However, and once that critical line is crossed - based on a deep enough and comprehensive enough grasp of the overall structure associated, along with the various types of leverage that insight might deliver - a completely different state will be found.

Therefore, the point of 2EQ is not only to predict that this state exists, and to explain what it is in functional terms. The point is to lay the foundations for making that transition event more accessible over time, even to the point where it becomes commonplace. But that will only occur on the basis of collective effort, not individual insight, like the proverbial jumbo jet - fully accessible to everyone, but fully understood by very few. That's what technology is in the end, with a 'cultural technology' being what we are talking about here essentially.

So yes, there is no 'proof' for the 'jumbo jet' level of process here, any more than the Wright brothers had proof of such things. But I think it is fair to say that people everywhere were immediately able to grasp the basic reality - and to see that such things would emerge before too long. A clear potential is defined here: an event exists, it can be removed, and there are things that make that possibility more or less likely to occur. It isn't rocket science to work that much out.

Given what's at stake, that's really all we need to know. And it's not as if this is all just 'shooting in the dark' theory - there is already ample evidence for the occasional, accidental, incidental, release being defined, but not ever in the intentional or repeatable cascading sense we will be suggesting here. If what we were talking about here was fire, then those rare events would still represent proof of concept in a sense - proof that it exists etc, but only in a context where it happens to be produced by a random lightning strike.

But that's not what we are chasing here. What we want here, in contrast, is a proverbial box of matches instead. We don't want to just know it exists, we want to be able to generate it on demand. And that is what this framework provides for.

Central to understanding the 'transition event' indicated is the dynamic equilibrium of the present state, along with details of the various expressions this subversive activity might adopt as it gets threatened in this way, which together provide a clear enough path to resolution when combined into a 'holistic' approach. It is like a controlled demolition in a sense - you don't start at the top, and you don't just start on one side. You start at the bottom with equally spaced charges all around the base, and before that you will set charges to weaken the entire structure in a very strategic manner. Then, and only then - once the entire thing is primed - will you take out the key supports in a single sweeping action.

The whole structure will not come down in an instant at that point, but the cascading nature of the change you have produced will eventually mean the entire thing will indeed come down. Although, it is also fair to say that, yes - there are probably potentials for a 'partial realisation' in this situation, like those videos where you see a building only come down halfway due to a poor approach, and then just stand there teetering. It is also possible to experience the same sense of release associated with the transition to the second equilibrium, except that you are actually just sliding back into the old state - having made the climb, but ultimately falling short of the threshold. All of which is by the by in this context, but worth pointing out nevertheless. There are lots of potentials in this situation, not only this summary release, and all of those come into view as soon as you have the model fully articulated.

Obviously, the main possibility we will be focusing on here is the summary release of the entire event, and what that actually means from the perspective of any typical person. In general, and in keeping with the scale and nature of the activity that is undone in that transition, what we see reported is a level of happiness (freedom from struggle and suffering) far beyond what we generally understand as even being possible. It is, by definition, always going to be exactly equivalent in positive scale and significance to the negative complex of very dynamic confusion and conflict that is removed. And this is the key here I suppose - the definition provided by this emerging anatomy indicates an event that is far more dramatic and sprawling than we might otherwise have suspected. In some sense it was only so very well concealed because it was so big, not because it is so small.

So what does all of this mean for the average person, then? Where does this leave you?

If we consider how the typical person views their own life process, all of this has very profound implications, especially when you start to consider the core foundations of life at an emotional level. It literally cleaves the emotional foundations of life in two, defining one entire half as being not only surplus but actually directly dysfunctional. And in doing this it casts an entirely new light on what happiness actually is, and where it might be found. So that instead of simply submitting blindly to whatever pattern of emotional or mental activity you happen to find at any moment, and seeking to fulfil the drives and tendencies associated, there is a far deeper idea that steps forward as the main axiom around which all plans can be arranged - that being the removal of a massive section of our internal activity instead, and that whatever remains might already be in a fulfilled state.

After all, happiness is - by definition - the fulfilment of desire. So if something is essentially manufacturing surplus desire in a very dynamic way, then what we see in that case is a very powerful and dynamic 'unhappiness generator'. And the answer in that case is clearly not to run around seeking to fulfil such surplus desires, as the world would have us do - it is to be able to tell such added activity apart from true desires and then strategically isolate and remove them. And most especially, if there turns out to be a definable action that can remove all such added disruption in a single sweeping stroke, then that emergent strategy essentially becomes the singular defining 'answer to happiness'.

One of the main issues we have here, when it comes to explaining just how significant a shift this is at an individual experiential level, is that one of the primary mechanisms of 'containment' associated with this event is a kind of 'forgetting' of what the true and open bliss of being really feels like. Basically, in order to survive hell, we forget what heaven felt like. It is just one of many ways we can manage the resulting state at an emotional level. So even when we are presented with the logical possibility of experiencing something much better than we currently do, we really have no way to meaningfully understand what that might be, or that such even exists. We strategically forget how good we used to feel, in order to prevent grief at the loss of such. And in this way we turn the volume down on our emotional stress, but we also remove the essential motivations that might otherwise be necessary to move us to a better state - assuming a better state was available - but for most people that is once again something they dare not even hope for. The typical state is often one underpinned by a sort of defeated resignation. As the old saying goes - "due to economic hardship, the light at the end of the tunnel has been turned off".

Therefore, what we see emerging here in general is a possibility for a shift in personal state that most people cannot even begin to imagine, via a mechanism they never even knew existed, and one that functionally removes an issue they didn't even know they were suffering from. And the impact of this shift in overall terms ends up being far more dramatic than any degree of personal fulfilment (within the typical state) could ever deliver, and all essentially for free. It is basically permanent once achieved, and requires no maintenance whatsoever. The event is simply gone, and the impact of that is far outside anything we might have generally considered possible.

So that is the positive polarity we see emerging here, that is the rising sun. And in this case that is just so overwhelmingly beautiful that nothing you might ever say or do from within the typical state (the current conflicted equilibrium) will ever be able to adequately communicate it to you - you would ultimately need to just go there, and experience it directly. Crossing that threshold literally represents the summary resolution of hundreds of otherwise intractable issues, all in a single sweeping stroke.

On the other side, and the dark polarity that drives the moral charge here, is the visceral understanding that if this singular release at the core is not found, then all of those myriad issues will forever remain active and embedded as an intrinsic part of life. The whole idea of achieving any kind of lasting peace or fulfilment overall will forever become a game of existential whack a mole, where one mirage will lead forever to the next, and so on, with no thirst ever really being quenched.

In summary, then, and at the individual level, what we see is a kind of right angle turn. A fork in the road. And this is what capture ultimately means. The entire game of life very suddenly comes to no longer be oriented around the fulfilment of desire in the ordinary sense, nor about using your emotional compass as we normally might, because both of these things become deeply suspect in light of the true and only aim presented. Instead of that, what we see emerging is a life process that is geared around the possibility of this summary relinquishment instead, where this massive body of added but concealed subversion is finally and completely released. There really is no third option.

To keep it is to suffer forever - to remove it is to be permanently and effortlessly free.

And yet - how? This then becomes the golden question here. What is the point of all of this if the transition being suggested is always going to remain beyond the reach of most people? Why even know about it, if you can't actually have it? But we will get to that 'how' aspect below, once we begin to examine the entire thing at a more collective level.

The main thing to see here is the relative scale and significance of the singular transition being indicated as a possibility, and also to notice just how concealed it has been. In just the same way as the problem is concealed from view, so the solution is just as hidden as a possibility. And what this means is that there exists, right now, a potential for happiness that is far beyond anything you have dreamed about, and that you have never even heard of it.

Well, you might have heard of it, perhaps, but in general all such reports are considered suspect at best, and certainly not validated as a real and achievable option in life.

Therefore, what would it mean to give this to someone? Imagine being in that position - think about the possibility of being placed in a situation where you might realistically be able to make this possibility directly accessible to someone. What would that mean? That would literally be the highest form of love available. Truly, of all the things that a person might ever receive, this would be the greatest by far - by an order of magnitude. It is the deepest love of all. True, real, profound, permanent - a return home, forever.

And yes, this really can be given. Indeed, it can only be given, because on your own you can never achieve it. Together, however, it will be easy.

But just to be clear, what would you have given them in that case? Nothing at all. And yet, in that context 'nothing at all' is actually the greatest gift possible, if that implies the permanent absence of a very deep struggle they really couldn't get out of on their own. And this is why all the sages go on and on about blissful 'emptiness' and the ecstatic 'void'. It is just nothing - i.e. the absence of something. The problem is that they never explain what that something actually was, but that is what we are seeking to remedy here once and for all. It's just not very nice, that's all. But isn't that the point? If you can remove it, and if you didn't even know it was there, then the worse it is the better, right? Yes. And is it bad? Yes, it's very bad. So bad that most people can't even look. But most people won't need to, we have experts for that.

So what will motivate those few experts? Love. To heal people, in the deepest possible sense, and permanently. To bring them home. All of them. Everywhere.

There is no greater love, no higher gift, no deeper surrender. But nobody can see that paradise even when it is placed right in front of them as we are doing here, if only because it was taken away - the mere knowledge of it has been removed from our internal realm. And yet, we still hear the echo of it, we feel the absence. We remember somehow. It seeps through the cracks and makes us long for something more. And there really is more. That is real. A completely different state does indeed exist. The intuition is correct.

At this point things perhaps even start to get a little 'cosmic' in a sense, if we take a detour at this point to compute the wider and deeper implications of the basic structure of this situation. But consider the obvious ramifications - if what we call a 'typical human life' is actually dominated by an enormous but also completely hidden, but very local, process of dynamic subversion - one that generates a great deal of very pervasive suffering and struggle in our case - then what we experience subjectively as being 'normal' is not actually normal at all.

Which is to say, if the basic model is correct, then it resets the baseline for existence itself to account for a very powerful local distortion - thereby defining what people have been calling 'spiritual enlightenment' as being just the normal background state of the universe itself. And not only that, but that this 'background reality' is actually far more radiantly ecstatic than we can generally even imagine from within our dire state of very limited subjective captivity.

We alone have been duped into thinking that the entire universe is a lot more hostile to conscious experience than it actually is. And this is why we spend so much of our energy trying to answer questions that other animals wouldn't need to ask, even if they had the intelligence. They all remain in the primal union, a state of profound and visceral trust in the greater process of which they are a part, a trust we have managed to shatter, and that we can barely even remember. And yet, a yearning remains, an echo of what was lost. The entire 'spiritual quest' is itself just part of the disease it is trying to cure. But such questions are never answered, because the thing they are seeking was never actually lost.

When you return home, you simply stop asking those questions, because there is no longer any fundamental problem to solve. And this is why you can't ever 'lose' that resulting state - it is because you would literally need to 'lose' the entire universe.

Basically - what it means is that everything in the entire universe is 'spiritually enlightened', except us, if only because what we have been calling spiritual enlightenment is actually just the removal of a very unique problem that we alone have managed to generate.

If we extend this further, and just to be clear, we also cease to generate the originating crisis at the root of all this every time we enter deep sleep, which is why we sense that state as being blissful. It is also implied that we will all enter that same state when we die, no matter what we might suffer whilst alive, so it is waiting for us regardless. And yet we can experience the same radiance while still alive, the same deep sense of bliss we know in deep sleep, when we are wide awake - as universally reported by all those who have managed to discover this 'free' state.

In any case, you only need to sit and listen to anyone who has 'found' this state in order to understand just how profound this possibility really is. It is also so simple - just the absence of something. And yet, that mere absence also happens to be exactly coincident with happiness, or whatever other terms you might use to define it. You simply become human again, with all that this implies. It's just that we didn't realise that what we are now is not actually human. We are twisted and conflicted monsters by comparison to that clear and simple state.

•

So anyway, what is it going to look like in practice? What are we actually talking about here?

The process of facilitated transition will be different for every person, which is why the whole thing requires a cultural context and the full anatomy associated, ideally in some kind of institutionalized form.

Any particular person will inevitably need to be assessed in some way using various measures - or selected in the first instance so as to conform to a known pattern - the low hanging fruit etc. But either way some kind of assessment will be made in relation to the particular pattern of containment any person has adopted, and then a very strategic sequence of processes will need to be implemented so as to shift all of the deep loading in a very strategic manner. The function will be to thereby make the core event structurally available to influence, at which point that core event can then be taken out in a singular decisive action, thereby initiating the wider cascading collapse.

This exact same thing is clearly what happens in any case where someone has spontaneously had this realization - they knocked over this core event in a context where, for whatever reasons, the loading associated had already been moved or shifted into a pattern amenable to the propagation of that collapse. But this deeper loading is the part they don't generally understand, and can never repeat in anyone else, so when everyone else tries the same thing it basically doesn't work. And this is because the true core of the crisis is not the part that hurts you, and it is also not the part that locks the entire system into place. It is the vast body of containments that do that.

So as already indicated, it is a bit like demolishing a building - there is a certain process and sequence required in order for that to occur most effectively.

This same picture would also tend to indicate quite strongly that in many cases those who have had this realization happen 'just spontaneously' may actually have just been suffering from a very weak structure that merely collapsed in on its own weight, rather than the type of concrete ego bunker that most people seem to display and that regard. Obviously, the types of manipulation that managed to collapse a flimsy wooden structure are not going to work on a concrete bunker. And this is where we see gurus failing to repeat that realization in adherents, even when they are extremely devoted.

Basically, people who somehow manage to 'miraculously' find this other state do not have any idea of the critical anatomy that defines that shift in equilibrium, and as a result always struggle to repeat that in anyone else. But this is not their fault. It is simply that we do not - as a culture - provide this bit of information. Not yet. Nor do we presently embody the very particular type of collective unity that might make this transition available as a realistic option. Not yet. Which means that the only true path to individual happiness is presently blocked at a cultural level by a failure to either understand - or solve - the issue at the root of that question.

Hence, the world remains in the twisted state it is in, if only because the world is merely a reflection of all the people who make it up, and because those individuals - below all of their puff and bluster - still privately remain so deeply distressed and conflicted.

So in the end what we see here is an extremely loaded moral imperative, but still one that has no obvious avenue of expression, which means that at this stage there really isn't much use in knowing all of this, even if it happened to be true. It's basically like discovering proof that unicorns exist, but only on some other planet, one we can't ever get to. We all just end up back in the same situation, except now perhaps knowing that it is actually quite a bit worse than we imagined, but still with not a whole lot we can actually do about it. But this is where we chase that individual rat up the collective drainpipe, so to speak, in order to see where the real game needs to happen.

•

At this stage we need to examine culture, and the way all of this is expressed in the collective -

As we now transfer this entire question up a level so as to see where the whole thing is presently stuck, what we capture is the ability of collective action to very dramatically affect outcomes at an individual level. Things can be achieved collectively that could simply never be achieved by any individual working alone. And in this instance that is particularly true. But in this we also see the challenge.

In this instance two things are required in order to dramatically impact the individual in this most important of all senses, by making this hidden potential reliably accessible.

The first thing is unified action and cooperative effort in relation to the deployment of directly applicable practical modalities that relate to such a potential being achieved in any individual. And the second thing is the information this unified action would require.

There would need to be an ongoing process of collective exploration and development that was being undertaken by people who were eminently qualified to navigate the sort of territory associated, and for that at least some sort of foundational resource material would need to be provided. The parameters of the task would need to be established, along with as much orienting framework as possible.

Basically, people would need to know the rules of the game, where the goal is, and especially to understand what will happen if they do manage to score even a single point.

The type of collaborative engagement associated with facilitating this seminal shift in any individual is not in any way rare - you see this everywhere, in every corporation, every university, and every government department. In any instance where the outcome is clear, we see people organising themselves around a unified purpose and achieving amazing objectives.

The information, on the other hand, has been missing. So much so that - as we have indicated - even the fact that this 'singular unequivocal transition' possibility in the individual basically exists has been completely beyond our collective awareness until now. So nobody is even working on this possibility. Indeed, nobody even knows it is there, not in any meaningful sense.

Even those who currently believe in and adhere to this 'release potential' are not aware of its actual nature, or that it could - in the future - quite easily become both known as well as reliably accessible to even the average person.

This, therefore, is what changes at this moment in history. It is all about this bit of critical information, this functional anatomy, and most especially about getting that into the right hands. But before we get to that part, we can first of all lay out the overall situation here in some kind of very clear manner. And for that we might now return to a metaphor we have used above - the analogy of powered flight.

In the individual we see a transition to another state. An unequivocal singularity, not some transient effect. From one bowl to another - the shift to a second equilibrium. Hence 2EQ.

This is the basis of the paradigm here, it is all about the singular and unequivocal nature of this transition event, and how it is not just some temporary aberration. Like a dam bursting, it is a shift from one very stable state to another very stable state, and in this instance - in just the same way - one that will not ever simply revert back to the way things were before.

So you have to ask yourself what might happen if ever that potential was going to be made available to even a single individual in a way that was both accessible as well as repeatable. What would happen if that occurred even once? I mean this potential occurs just naturally on occasion, but what if any group was able to penetrate the underlying dynamic sufficiently to enable them to stimulate that transition event intentionally?

This is the aspect you need to understand here - in that moment every person on the planet effectively becomes "awakened" in due course, in just the same way as Wright brothers to jumbo jet was not a variable outcome. It was a certain outcome. And not only jumbo jets of course - every type of powered flight can be seen to have originated from that singular proof of concept, and the collective imagination it awakened. All of that essentially happened at Kittyhawk that one day, the whole lot. In particular, however, it was the motion camera, not the plane. The plane could have been doing that for a year prior to that day without making any impact whatsoever. Public demonstration was the key factor.

It turns out that this is a surprisingly good analogy for what will occur in this instance. In which case it is worth pulling forward this first very intentional, repeatable, act as being very significant in this context. Because in just the same way as that first recording meant that one day everyone would fly, that first proof of concept - even long before it is viewed on an FMRI machine - will spark such a storm of interest and activity that the resulting explosion of applications will mean that this potential release will not only be fully understood in due course, but also made as accessible as it could possibly be. And in essence, what that means is that the moment that first one happens, in such a controlled context, it is really happening for every person on the planet.

How certain can we be about this automatic progression? You only need to examine the Wright Brothers, and consider how many variations there might have been to see the answer to this. Essentially none. No matter where it began, the ultimate form of all final variations was always going to converge on the same basic platform eventually, as defined by the particular constraints associated.

It is very certain, in many ways far more so than flight, given how much more is at stake, and how there will also be no physical technology required. Enormous impetus already exists in the individual, and the entire possibility was only hidden rather than particularly difficult, so the moment attention bears down on this potential - especially in a context where there is a theory that was able to produce the practical result - the whole thing will simply explode. Just as aviation did.

Therefore, we have a milestone here, a kind of transition point. We actually see a direct reflection of the individual transition as it is expressed in the collective. If we can bring the entirety of humanity down to this one initial demonstration, then what we see is that at this moment of reliable proof that the entire world essentially transitions from one equilibrium to the other at that very moment. It doesn't need to all happen instantly, but the point is that there is a moment when it basically becomes inevitable, and effectively unstoppable.

This is what 2EQ really means. Only this. 2EQ as a paradigm is all about the existence of a singular threshold where this transition in the individual becomes a runaway event at a cultural level, effectively flipping all people in due course, not just one.

Yes, an individual might be important, especially given the depth of the transition implied - but all individuals, that is another thing again. And this is why people can never grasp it at first, it is simply madness to begin to think in these terms. But what if it was true?

Take a look around at the world, or just feel into yourself for a moment - would the existence of such a concealed dilemma make sense to you based on what you see? Does it basically fit?

Do you also think it is reasonable to say that we at least see some evidence for some mysterious 'release' event that fits this profile currently, and all the way throughout history? And if so, what would lead you to think that this potential is not just a natural phenomenon of some kind, and therefore entirely able to be understood as well as manipulated on the basis of such comprehension?

Once you see this possibility, and just how comparatively near it rests, it is all over morally. Especially when you realise what this means for you personally by implication. It all starts off with the threshold in the individual as a foundational reality, and with understanding how that actually works - what defines it, and how it might be reached etc - practically speaking. But yes, it is this wider unstoppable cascade that really defines it, and that produces so much ethical force. The transition itself only changes an individual. But this wider cascade of realisation changes the entire world - permanently.

However, and just as with the individual situation, what we see is a kind of ethical polarity emerging here, a fork in the road so to speak, as indicated. On the one hand there is a situation where none of our collective problems will ever fundamentally resolve, and on the other we see the possibility of addressing all of those in a singular defining act.

More explicitly, the current situation defines a state in which none of our true problems will ever be overcome if this central issue is not addressed and resolved in the individual. Conversely, if this is addressed in the individual then all those deeply intractable issues will be swept aside automatically.

This stark polarity is the essence of 'capture' in this context, and the foundations of the moral shift associated. It is all about the moment you see the intractable nature of our situation for as long as this issue remains present and active within us all - essentially how you will never be truly happy in the current state. Not ever. And the world will remain locked into its current terminal spiral of conflict and destruction in that case also, forever chasing its tail trying to fix upstream problems in a downstream way. And then to have all of that juxtaposed against just the tiny little trigger that will set off this great cascading change - the impetus is simply overwhelming. What could there possibly be to lose? Apart from a little bit of embarrassment I suppose, at the fact of having overlooked something so apparently obvious for all this time.

The two end states indicated are mutually exclusive. This is the key thing. We can't have both. And it will be down to just a small few to make this decision for everyone. That's what the first proof of concept in practice implies - the moment we hit that point, even once, the second equilibrium has effectively been transitioned into at a collective level. And with that, every person on the planet has basically been liberated from a state of personal hell they didn't even know they were in. Not immediately, but like having the first small hole in the dyke, at that point it essentially becomes a fait accompli. This is why those first few really need to know what they are doing, and not just wander into it blindly. It needs to be an intentional conscious act to end the current bind, and usher in something entirely different.

So ask yourself this - did commercial flight really begin with the Wright brothers? Or were there actually events prior to that moment which made such a demonstration effectively certain before long, if not there, then somewhere else?

There actually were, and the same is true here. And with this fact what we see is that the true transition in a collective sense is not actually to be found at that point of practical demonstration, but a bit further back, and at a point that is even more accessible. Indeed, an entire series of associated thresholds can in some cases be established as being connected with certainty, making them an automatic chain of inevitability, rather than separate events at all. And most importantly of all, whatever that initiating trigger was, it was probably a decision made by a single individual in a single location on a single day. Nobody got to vote for it, or against it - because when it comes to technology, rather than politics, the world does not need to be consulted.

So perhaps we should follow those back in this instance, just to see where we end up here. What is something that would lead inevitably to this so-called kittyhawk moment in this case, and why don't we presently see it? For this practical demonstration to emerge we would need to see an ongoing process of active exploration and dialogue occurring at the right intellectual level, within the right sort of cultural framework, out of which will eventually emerge a few people sufficiently empowered to formulate the first tentative practical applications.

This is quite obvious if you think about it, so the establishment of this active culture becomes a prior threshold.

So what does this take? As with all such collective endeavours, the key is to have a common vision, as generally defined by some kind of shared theoretical foundation.

Therefore, what is the particular body of information associated with the germination of this wider conversation at the right level? In this case that might take many forms, probably a very heavy resource in due course, the proverbial 'foundation stone' of 2EQ etc, in whatever form that arrives over time. But in the first instance these foundations might be established on a far less formal basis, with merely a comprehensive exposition of the entire structure of the paradigm in conversation - an exploration at the right level, in the right terms, with the right people.

This recorded sequence is what we generally call the 'icebreaker', in that it opens the way for others to follow. The people involved in that chat need not even be those who will be engaged in the broader exploration, and there may also be various different versions of this sequence emerging over time.

Either way, the singular point of producing such materials will be to allow anyone at the appropriate level of ability and interest to listen through such a sequence, and thereby to broadly come up to speed, then allowing them to join the conversation at a level that not only holds ground, but which moves forward right from the start.

So once again - how certain can we be that the right information in the right hands will lead to this practical ignition moment? Very certain, in just the same way as what the Wright brothers did was not just some leap of creative genius. There were actually quite a few people chasing that possibility at the time, all based on elementary aviation theory already having been circulated quite widely just prior. Some were spending millions on that quest. So in many ways you could even say that it was the information that produced that outcome as an inevitability over time, in which case we can certainly trace the origins of modern air travel back beyond that first demonstration of powered flight. It wasn't actually a plane that made it all possible, nor the ingenuity of those who built it. And it wasn't even the camera, as we have stated, because all of that would have occurred somewhere else within weeks or months if it had not have happened there, based on conditions that had already been primed to produce such an outcome before long with certainty. It was, therefore, most likely a fountain pen that fundamentally tipped the balance.

So what is the proverbial fountain pen in this instance? What makes the possibility of recording this 'icebreaker' sequence a near certain reality over time? The only thing required for this is what we are doing here - only what we are calling 'capture' is required, but most especially for that to occur at the right level of intellectual competence, as indicated above in the square diagram.

So once again, how certain can we be that we can find people at the right level, that achieving this 'capture' will be possible with that group, and that as a result this 'icebreaker' sequence will become certain before long? Pretty certain. It would only appear to be a numbers game now, and probably only quite small numbers also. Indeed, we probably only need to poke around and see. At the right level of audience, everyone will probably already know each other, so it really might only take a single person in order to produce the necessary combination of comprehension and propagation associated with the 'icebreaker' being reached as an inevitability downstream from that.

In a very real sense, then, what we see is the collective threshold moving backwards here, into more and more accessible territory. The threshold gets lower and lower, more and more refined, but always carrying the same basic weight of implication. And if this chain of events really can be established with some certainty, then what this pending cascade effectively means is that the entire collective unfolding will become unstoppable very early on, meaning that the end state associated will basically be assured right at the start, not at some great peak of transition in the future. The hump is pulled forward so to speak, and lowered to just this singular threshold - mere capture at the right level, perhaps even with a single individual, provided they are smart enough, and have the right connections.

The problem, however, is not probability, it is security. As these various thresholds come down from the Wright Brothers moment in practice they also become more tenuous and dependent. They are easier to reach, but not as solid to stand on, in the same way that the finest tinder tends to be the most fragile. So whilst the fire might be easier to start at that level, it is also easy to accidentally snuff out. And what this means is that although the practical 'proof of concept' threshold might be singular, and only need to happen once, at the various stages back before that there is more need to take a 'more the better' approach, and to do it many times, and in many places. Just as when firemen are doing a controlled burn, they don't just light a single point, they wander along lighting the grass at hundreds of different spots, just to make sure. The result might be a single fire at the end of the day, but it didn't arise from a single point. And so that's what we will probably end up with here before long - not just one pebble dropped into the pond, but possibly even a few, just to see which one ultimately kicks off the big wave to follow. It will be sort of like a race in that sense.

Therefore, we stand at an explosive threshold here. At the very thin end of the wedge we are only really talking about a few of the right people being able to see what's at stake in this situation in overall terms, and then being able to calculate the small things that inevitably lead to the big things.

And how difficult might that be? I guess we'll see. At present the only way to securely reach this point of capture has been to speak to me directly, but I wonder how close we have come even here?

I mean, are you actually understanding any of this? Does it make any sense to you at all?

Does it make sense to you that if all of this ends up being correct, then you will never be truly happy. Not really. Not in the sense you were born to expect. And also that the entire world will remain in its current conflicted state, forever.

But in contrast, if this possibility can be understood sufficiently by any group to enable that transition to be intentionally stimulated-facilitated, then not only will that release a single person - it will release all people downstream from there, including you, with clear and obvious consequences for the world as a whole. At that moment we effectively enter a new and 'golden age' of human civilization.

And yes, it seems mad. I get that. It is obviously a lot to take in, but I didn't define any of this, I am only describing it. The problem is merely that we are sketching out a bit of territory that most people have never entered, and in many cases aren't well prepared for. But it is also the one bit of missing information that stands to break the bank for everyone, and all we are doing here is trying to explain how all of that might work. It no doubt seems presumptuous to be projecting so far forward based on so little having happened at this stage, but it is precisely by seeing where all of this is going that we can see the significance of events in the present. That's sort of what capture is I guess, it is all about the moment you see how the small things early on relate to the big things downstream from there.

So as I say, does it make sense?

The progression is this -

- A few people will reach this point of capture, wherein they manage to grasp what all of this means, and what's at stake - the staggering implications associated with reaching that Wright brothers moment in this instance etc, along with just how near that is to being made inevitable by a few minor acts of intelligent courage. This can happen as many times as necessary.
- They will then naturally propagate that same awareness out into the fabric of their intellectual landscape, building impetus at every successive stage, until eventually attention will come to be focused on the next obvious threshold - the recording of the 'icebreaker' level of exploration together, so as to lay the foundations for a much more meaningful process of group exploration. All of which might take who knows how many sessions - maybe 5-10 I suppose - depending on the level of detail being extracted. But ultimately there is no obvious limit, it is like a fire once again in this sense, you can just keep piling on bigger and bigger logs. And the same will be true here in a sense, the conversation we will be starting will not have any natural limits. So I guess this 'icebreaker' will take many different forms over time, depending on the particular levels of audience associated. This can happen as many times as necessary.
- Out of this foundational cultural dialogue will eventually emerge a few hard nuts who are brave enough to put all of this into action and try it out, and sooner or later these efforts will result in a single successful transition in a controlled environment. This can happen as many times as necessary.
- BOOM.

That's it - just three steps. We could define some of the stages the whole thing might obviously move through subsequent to that practical demonstration, but we don't really need to. Indeed we didn't even need to define the second and third steps just indicated, because they are in turn both automatic and unavoidable consequences of the first being reliably achieved enough times at the right level.

Hence, we only need to be explaining what all of this means to a rare and talented few, and all the rest will simply happen - assuming they do indeed manage to grasp it.

Just to be clear, then, we are not even talking about what anyone might do in this situation. We are only talking about making people aware of what the true situation actually is, along with the very real potentials associated. Just the first two steps above - which together might only take a few weeks to fulfill. What people will then do about all of that (the third 'explosive' step) will be completely automatic.

It is quite a simple situation in that regard -

- That such an event might exist. Approaches such as TMT have already proven this, but actually the scope and nature goes far beyond the boundaries of their research.

- That it is ultimately singular, integrated, and extrinsic. It is something added - we don't see it in other animals etc.
- That there is the possibility of not only manipulating it, but of removing it entirely (we see this occasionally in what we have historically given names like 'awakening' or 'spiritual enlightenment' but it has been very misunderstood and those names do not reflect what it actually is).
- The functional separation of these two events for the first time - if that can be achieved at a cultural level - will inevitably allow for the increasing ability to manage and affect it, and eventually to facilitate its undoing in the sense being indicated.
- This relinquishment will, in that case, not be anything we haven't seen before, because it does already happen occasionally. But in this case it will be different because it will be both produced by - as well as explained by - a theoretical foundation that will immediately increase the likelihood of being able to repeat that in a second individual. And so on, until it begins to propagate freely, all on its own.

This is the real key here - it is all about this runaway threshold, where a previously very rare potential for deep level individual transformation - something that was previously only random and accidental and very poorly understood - becomes intentional and repeatable and entirely comprehended, thereby opening the floodgates on the single greatest process of individual and collective change the world has ever seen.

Beyond the existence of this epic cascading possibility, if we work backwards, the actual threshold where all of this becomes inevitable is much earlier on - in many ways at just the point we are aiming at here. It is all merely resting on our ability to achieve this basic 'capture' here - for people to see what it all means, both for themselves, and for the world. This is where the entire thing has always been trapped - it was not really about the ability of human culture to make this transition available to the average person, it was always just about people being able to see that it exists in the first place. It was only hidden, not difficult. But yes, it does still require some degree of collective development in order to make that possible, so communicating to at least a few becomes the game.

The brief journey we are taking here in this appendix is itself a last minute preparation for such, just to see if we might increase the efficiency by joining up at least a few of the necessary dots for people.

You never know, it might even be possible that someone out there will understand all of this, even in this form, and that the bird of 'capture' will be free of this cage at last. In the future I think the possibility of that scalable form will be pretty much certain, so we can only keep hacking away at it here until we get there.

So it is hard to know how this might be landing for you here, as I say. Everyone seems to have a slightly different series of gaps in their circuit, so for some people this requires only one or two connections to be made, while for others there are an entire series of broken links. But hopefully we are starting to get some of them lined up for you here.

What matters is that there is a relatively accessible threshold that will, if reached, result in a very dramatic downstream outcome for every individual, and for the world as a whole - in this case an end state people generally didn't even know was possible. But also, and unavoidably, that reaching this elementary ignition point will steer the ship of conversation straight towards the single greatest individual and collective fear we are haunted by, in a way that will demand great courage and humility from the few who manage to overcome all the natural resistance associated.

•

Somehow, then, we need to round all of this up in some kind of summary way. And there seems to be no way to do that without at least taking a moment to reorient ourselves around the scale of what is being proposed here. This is the main issue. We need to grasp just how big it all is.

When you examine the functional anatomy associated, as we are defining it in the individual, the whole thing really isn't that outlandish. The basic idea that there might be something pretty serious going on beneath the surface of life is no longer even debated - research has at least established that much. The only question has been what it really is, and how it all might work. But that is the bit we see emerging here at last.

What you see defined in the detailed anatomy 2EQ delivers is an added body of behaviour that is pervasive and dynamic and very powerful - an independent functional agenda essentially, one that maintains a very particular pattern of rather tragic imbalance over time. And the byproduct of that activity is an enormous amount of rather disturbing behavioural tendency on the one hand, as well as some equally dark internal experience on the other.

So when you consider the prospect of removing this complex in its entirety, and if you compare the emotional outcome to any sort of typical acquisition or achievement or experience within the present conflicted state, there really is no competition. Everyone who has ever found this point of release has said the same thing. The outcome of this singular (internal) shift is permanently effortless, as well as many times higher reward than even the best (external) creative achievement.

In other words - the difference this singular and permanent internal shift makes to the way you experience life overall will far outweigh any positive emotional outcomes associated with even the deepest shift in external circumstances you might ever be fortunate enough to experience. The key to happiness really does lie within, but how does that help if you can't find that key on your own, and if nobody else knows how to help either?

This is the real puzzle here - even those rare few who have directly experienced this shift in themselves still can't help anyone else 'achieve' that state. Not in any reliable sense. So it remains rare, and random, and in that form has made no difference at all in the life of the average person on the planet.

Consider, however, the possibility of this cascading event, and that this 'great wave' will be effectively unavoidable the moment that first transition is stimulated intentionally, and what that will mean for the world as a whole.

So if all of this individual impact is now translated into collective terms, what we see is the relative significance of the events being defined, when compared to other so-called important events. And this one turns out to be so incredibly dramatic that it is difficult to get your head around.

It really is hard to find any historical precedent for something this epic at a collective level, in that 100% of all development throughout recorded history has occurred on the basis of the same base unit - that being the typical (conflicted) individual. Whereas for the first time ever, what we see here is not only an adjustment of that base unit, but a far more significant adjustment than we ever dreamt possible based on the typical perception - a perception that assumes the common person is just natural and normal humanity in the raw. But actually, they aren't.

Think of a big circular pond, and then imagine that what we might tend to think of as very significant events on a historical time scale are actually just ripples on the surface of that stagnant pond - they are all just variations on the same theme. But then imagine that the current pond we see, what we call common culture, is actually just the result of a dam that has stemmed the flow of a beautiful river. And then think of that dam collapsing.

That event would not just be one more ripple on the pond. That would be something else again - much deeper, much bigger, and could also happen much faster. The entire pond will disappear, suddenly becoming a river again, as it was always meant to be before the existential beavers arrived to screw things up. It is a level of change that will simply never really make much sense for most people, not until they see it happen. And even then they probably won't really understand it.

Therefore, what we are pointing at here - in the wake of that shift in every individual - is a fundamental adjustment of civilization as a whole. And not just a minor adjustment in each person, but a deep energetic shift in state, with the implied removal of a great deal of dynamic confusion.

So when this happens to every person on the planet, which is what we are talking about, what we get is a completely different collective organisation becoming possible. Rather than everything going in an endless confusing circle, suddenly all the energy will be moving together, and in the same direction.

Like cherries hanging from the same singular point, you won't need to push ideologies together - they will simply hang together naturally. And all the issues that are currently driven out of this foundational body of subversive drives in 8 billion individuals will simply evaporate overnight. The fact that we are all suffering from an issue we didn't even know is happening is a terrible idea for many people to confront, but it also means that we face the prospect of a solution so profound and sweeping that it almost boggles the mind. There really is nothing that even comes close.

For instance, religion will disappear entirely, forgotten before long as merely being something we used to suck on in the absence of real food. As just one example. Addiction, depression, suicide.. the list of downstream symptoms is endless. And they will all be wiped out. Just as with the individual and the functional separation of these two agendas, the entire foundation of human history will be cleaved in two, and as that added event is relinquished in every individual an entire section of culture - the part where all the weeds and rats grow - will simply fall away into the sea.

I wonder if you can even see it? I wonder if you can see the scale of it in the collective, the depth of it in the individual, the permanence of it, and how effortless it will be to maintain once it occurs? And all of that hinging on just the tiny initial spark of interest and comprehension generated the moment we achieve the 'capture' we are aiming at here, once that starts to happen at the right level of audience.

In the end there is a kind of absurdity to the whole thing, an astonishment, and this is another reason we often use the metaphor of an octopus. In general life is a bit like one of those videos where someone asks you to spot the octopus, and you really can't see it - but then it moves and you realise that it was right in front of you the whole time, but also that it was so much bigger than you thought!

Discovering that you have something so big lurking around in your little fish tank of a mind not only begins to make sense of so many previously mysterious events, but also brings another whole target into view. And this is how seeing all of it for the first time can produce such a deep disturbance in ethical and social terms - the whole possibility adds a weight to our moral landscape that is on the one hand very compelling once you have seen it for yourself, but which makes no sense at all for anyone who hasn't. So it can be polarising, as indicated. It can obviously tend to produce a dramatic and immediate shift of focus when someone grasps this, but for the most part nobody around them will be able to see what's even going on.

•

This is where we not only see the very powerful impetus associated, but also the social disruption it can cause as a result, which in turn begins to explain another underlying mystery - which is where all of this might have been hidden.

How could it possibly be true that it is this big, let alone that the ignition threshold might be resting so near? It doesn't make sense. But actually it does, in that it was hidden not because it is small, it was because it is so massive, and because concealment is its very purpose for existing.

Basically, the reason this radical freedom is not already available to every person on the planet is because the event that is removed in that transition has itself prevented awareness from penetrating the underlying anatomy required. We have not been aware that there are actually two things going on within us, rather than one, let alone that one of them can be removed. We simply didn't know this due to the very nature of the trap. Concealing itself, and its activities, is part of its whole modus operandi.

I suppose the main thing to pull forward here is just how dramatic it all is relative to anything else that currently exists in the typical moral landscape people assume in common culture. And also how polarising it can be, as indicated. There really is no obvious middle ground here - which means you either see it or you don't, and as a result you will either love it, or hate it. There really doesn't seem to be a third option in this case. And this can really cause issues for anyone who does see it - if only because this will inevitably leave them surrounded by people who have no idea what could possibly be going on. It really is a deeply polarising insight, and not only because of the very divergent path it indicates, but especially because it remains so invisible to most. It is a very strange situation, but also a very potent one. The dynamics associated make it very hard to penetrate at first, but once you do the entire thing will sort of just pop like a balloon.

In any case, the tension between those who see and those who don't can be rather intense, as we addressed in the main work above. Especially in any context where the issue is forced into the open in any sense. But for the most part - and as we saw there - the quite obvious solution is to simply not tell anyone.

This is something that in turn happens to be very easily achieved, and without any fuss at all, by simply keeping the two cultural events separated. So this is the issue solved. Exploring this particular territory together is a very extreme sport in this sense, and the boundary that separates it from common culture is there for a very good reason. The two cultures are entirely complementary, but only insofar as they can be kept separate from each other.

This is why all social contexts related to such dialogue should probably remain private, and in many cases by invitation only. It really only floats beyond a certain level, and prior to that there is little of value. Indeed, quite the opposite. To have just a little bit of this particular awareness would be a bit like throwing yourself into a ditch, rather than jumping cleanly to the other side. And that is why nobody should ever find themselves wandering into such a conversation merely by accident, not unless something has gone seriously wrong.

Fortunately, this 'safety margin' turns out to be quite easy to maintain. For the most part the subject matter itself tends to support this without even needing to try. Nobody will generally know what you are even talking about if they have not already acquired the basics and reached this point of capture. So you can essentially have such a conversation in a busy cafe and the people at the next table will be none the wiser.

In many ways you might think of 2EQ as being another language in this sense, and in this case the persistent inability of most people to understand what is being said prior to this initial capture being reached - the very thing we have been lamenting here - turns out to be a great advantage once just a few of the right people have been able to grasp it. At that stage it becomes a boon rather than a setback.

Beyond that, then - beyond making sure we manage to avoid engaging with anyone who basically isn't ready for such a profound event - what is the main focus here? What have we learned now, if we zoom right out again, to see the bigger picture?

Beyond building a secure firebox - the only thing remaining is to stoke the fire itself. And what universal form will this take? That all boils down to the simplest and most naturally human thing possible - to just talk, a lot, and in doing so to set the stage for all the conditions just outlined to inevitably be met. And this immediately makes a mockery even of what we are doing here, as we seek to bypass the need to chat for a bit by writing it all down in this way.

What are we achieving? Why avoid a thimble full of chat when you are going to need to drink a gallon? Really, the whole idea of avoiding that small chat right at the start means you aren't really seeing the forest for the trees here yet.

This is actually one of the rather humorous things we begin to see here as all of this comes into view so clearly. It is just incredible how psychologically and socially taboo the whole thing is. And yet, the power and reliability of this avoidance itself is highly suspicious - and would also tend to illustrate just how deeply threatened the unconscious mind is by merely the idea of getting together to chat about this issue. In which case, we immediately indicate the power of doing exactly that, right? This simple act of just sitting around in long form conversation, with this subject matter as the point of focus, is the one thing that appears to be metaphorical kryptonite for the proverbial octopus.

This has also been the nature of the entire event over time, and the primary hurdle to overcome. The subject matter, when combined with the overall scale of what it all implies, seems to just stun people into silence, and as a result the whole thing is left in a kind of intellectual and social vacuum. People make all the right noises, but at the end of the day they just won't ever actually talk about it.

And yet, does this mean that we want everyone to start talking about it? No. That might even be the worst possible outcome given the nature of the subject matter, and just how toxic most people might find that, as indicated. So the idea will be to get that conversation started at a level that is appropriate and broadly prepared, whilst at the same time doing everything we can to eliminate that possibility completely at any level below that, until the big wave arrives for those people - in simple practice by then, rather than any kind of complicated theory.

This has always been the main issue, and the root of our entrapment - all the power in this situation was always only ever going to arise out of collective exploration and development, and for that people would only need to talk about it. And yet, that is the one thing they will never do.

So the essential battle line here is between the vast and violent denial that pervades all of common culture, and just the very few who will be prepared to talk about it openly and explore it together. But it is simply amazing how even those you might otherwise have great respect for will somehow find every excuse possible to never actually find time to chat about this.

In each case the essential threshold is the same - for as long as people are not talking about it with others in any meaningful sense it is moving backwards and thereby forever maintaining the secure status quo. But the moment they begin doing that, the foundations of the new world are being laid - one by one, brick by brick, word by word. And up we go.

This was the main lesson I suppose. This entire body of awareness is like a very particular kind of taste, and you really can't adjust taste in people. So this is what we have had to accept. Some people are going to absolutely love this insight, even in this very roughly sketched format. And especially in conversation. They will jump straight in, and have no trouble at all. For them it will be an absolute hoot. Whereas others will freak out at the very first hint of it. And the lesson was that this most basic level of response cannot really be adjusted. We need to simply accept the reality that many will struggle and adopt a compassionate approach toward them, whilst at the same time moving forward in any areas where a more receptive audience might be found.

The main thing is that the initial stages of all of this were only ever going to be of particular interest to a rare and unusual minority - you might even call them freaks. What most people will find rather distasteful, or even terrifying, they will find fascinating and exhilarating. And beneath that, below any surface level attraction of aversion, we probably just see a reflection of the age-old axiom - that you really only tend to have a passion for things that you are naturally good at.

This is why we are speaking to only a few here - just the few who would not only like to be able to see it coming, but perhaps even to kick that entire thing off.

So how would we know? What does 'capture' look like in a qualified person? That's very simple really. And this is where we will finish up here -

Powerful energetic alignment.

That's what it looks like. There is no mistaking it, and it is generally immediate. This is the only final measure of 'capture' as we have been defining it here. We could explain how, and why, but we don't really need to. It is enough to say that this simple defining factor pretty much says it all in that regard.

What we have been calling 'capture' at a purely intellectual level is only the circuit, not the electricity. It is only when you see the overall scale and significance of the events being defined, and when all of that is resolved down to this tiny little comprehension threshold right at the beginning, that you really begin to understand the nature of the situation we presently face in moral and emotional terms.

This series of connections is important if only because it tells you what needs to happen next, as well as gives you more than enough motivation to make sure it occurs. It basically brings something very big directly within your own personal reach, and thereby vanquishes forever the sense of impotent resignation we are generally so accustomed to. Capture basically means energy and direction, which is really all you need to be a bullet. So if someone isn't moving fast, in exactly the right direction, then they basically didn't achieve capture yet. And this is why it is always very easy to tell if someone hasn't yet basically grasped what 2EQ is saying. As we always say - it is because they are still sitting down.

The main thing to see is that there are a series of interconnected thresholds associated, like a kind of domino cascade in a sense, which explains how the end state can be so massively epic in nature - but also just how comparatively tiny the first little domino might be. It is because of this chain, and how - once that one small trigger is pulled - all the rest will immediately begin to unfold. It will basically be unstoppable right from the start.

Once again, this is one of the things that come together in that 'capture' moment for people. It really is all about this cascading series of events, and where they lead. It is about the small actions in the present, and the big consequences they result in, as well as just how fast it will all go there.

Most especially, and in relation to the one very clear path all of this continues to indicate - it is to see that actually talking, directly and in person, will be the only path forward here. And not only with me of course, that is almost an irrelevance overall, but just in general.

So in many ways this up-front aspect is also a test as I say - like the minimum height requirement for a ride at Disneyland. Many people will stop just short of this chat and go no further, they won't actually listen, because for them listening is simply not one of the available options. The proverbial 'full cup', from the old zen parable, etc. They will unconsciously avoid the very capture we are indicating. Which is precisely the point of weeding that level out.

This changes everything, so if you already think you know the answer, then that's obviously going to disqualify you. And the idea here is to trim the audience down a bit in this sense right at the outset. We are not trying to offend anyone, or place anyone in a situation where they might immediately be out of their depth.

In the end there is actually quite a big menu here, with many different costs associated. There are many stages of the vast event being indicated, and at each stage many levels at which you might engage with it. But this walk up to the lookout together is the only part that isn't currently optional - that's a bit like checking your harness before you bungee jump.

So as I say, it is hard to know where you might still be getting stuck here, if that is the case. In conversation this would be easy, because I could just poke around a bit to check these various connections. Even now, as I keep writing here, we risk starting to go round in circles saying the same things over and over again, but still not really getting any closer to capture. And yet, attempting this in writing alone was sort of the point of this document, as just a kind of casual experiment, so it has been interesting to try it.

I guess we will see the next time we catch up. You will either have basically grasped all of this now, or you won't, and the only real proven remedy for that will be to take another moment to chat, just to see what's not quite lining up for you. Because all the information is here, in ample detail. Indeed, I think you will find that there is actually nothing new here that we didn't pick up in the first half, this has only been a matter of rearranging all of that correctly so as to be able to better calculate what it all means.

Therefore, we are always going to need to go for a little walk together. We have simply had far too many accidents now to ever skip over that part. But it's also a nice view, as I say, and safety first etc.

So anyway, what will you see up there, at that initial lookout?

An entirely new world - and a completely different self.

Of course, that sounds mad. But once again - that's only because you didn't take that little journey yet. It's not exactly difficult to find out, right? Try it first, then you can say.

This is actually the simple key to all of it. Just talking. This is the final bastion of our collective suffering - it is all about the collective silence this event has been able to instil. We don't even know we are doing it, not until someone points it out. And so that is the barrier that must be shattered, and shattered, and shattered.

The right people need to be sitting in circles in parks talking about this. They need to be sitting in cafes chatting away about it. They need to be laying on their backs looking up at the stars, ruminating with each other about all of it, how it all works, and what it all might mean. There should be courses available at your local university. But that entire conversation has always been impossible to even begin due to the absence of the necessary information, as indicated repeatedly above.

In the end the final threshold might be as simple as just this - for as long as those rare few who are capable are not talking about this issue, common culture is winning. And in that case our struggle remains permanent, and intractable. That might be all there is to it, both in public and in private. It is fear that defines our actions, rather than courage. And in that case we will remain stuck in our suffering forever. But the moment we are personally prepared to break that cycle of timid silence and actually chat about all of this openly, within a context where it is safe to do that, suddenly the eventual unraveling of this great ball of string becomes inevitable over time.

If we talk, we win - if we don't, we lose. But really, does it not seem like something worth at least exploring a bit, just in case it works out to be true? What could possibly be the harm? If it isn't correct then you simply won't find anything.

•

Honestly, sometimes I think that people are so deeply trapped in their internal trance that they will never be able to see beyond it, not without some kind of shock. And for most people that is probably true. They need to be stopped somehow, even just for a moment. So maybe we can break it all down for you one last time, just to make sure you understand -

This event - when it arrives in practice before too long - is going to derail every person's life process, at a very deep level, with what is essentially a 'shortcut to happiness'. The proposition will be so accessible, and so compelling, that everyone will take it - there will be few abstainers even in the first instance.

The price of this shift will be to tacitly accept the theoretical foundations that produced it, with all that they imply, and also that by definition the same shift will fundamentally undermine a huge section of the emotional underpinnings of the current approach to life.

Basically, the price of peace will be to accept the loss of all the internal conflict and struggle, as all of that falls away in a kind of landslide event. And let's be clear: We are talking about every person on the planet - a huge part of their life process dissolved. Gone. Forever.

This sudden leap forward is the first half of what 'capture' here implies in moral terms. The other half is what happens if we don't initiate this cascading shift, which is that the current situation will remain forever intractable. Both individually and collectively we will thereby remain locked into an invisible puzzle, suffering in ways we can't even fully feel, let alone express.

So yes, there is this great potential just sitting there - the biggest thing ever - and nobody is pursuing it if only because they don't even know it is there. But the main point of 2EQ is not to try to motivate or organise people to get up and make that happen. After all it is not a movement of any kind. There are no leaders, and it has no followers. It is just a map. It is just a flash bulb going off in the darkness. The only thing is just to make sure you understand that it does in fact exist in this sense, that it would change the world in ways we had never even known were possible, and that if this spiralling collective transformation is not realised to also understand that this means we will remain trapped forever - like being locked in a box full of rats.

The same sort of thing is true of my own efforts here, I am not saying they are worthy of attention. That's not what all of this is about. It has always been far beyond my limits, and the results in my life have been both obvious and extreme. That was the whole point of what was outlined in the addendum above. But once again, that has nothing whatsoever to do with the veracity of the overall claim, or whether others might be able to do it justice, if only I can get the whole thing out of my head and onto the table. We will only need enough resolution defined in order for me to be able to finally let it go, secure in the knowledge that it has been passed over at last. It has been a long journey, and it is all far too heavy and important to be left in the hands of someone so shattered by this attempt to catch it. But hey, it came to me. What should I have done? Did I do the wrong thing here? Was it not worth a try at least?

It was never the province of any individual person. That's like trying to fit the ocean into a teacup. The forces are immense, and the complexity is off the charts once you render all of this in actual terms. It is just too heavy.

If this does not happen, you will never be truly happy. Your children, your grandkids, all your friends - none of them will ever be truly happy, not in the way they were born to expect. And because of this pervasive discontent in the hearts of all people, the world as a whole will also continue to spiral out of control as it chases its own tail in search of fulfilment for needs that don't even really exist. Even an AI driven free energy utopia where everyone lived 300 years would not resolve this underlying issue - it would only ever be amplified as positive external pressure threatened to undermine containment of the core crisis at the root of emotional life.

On the other hand, the moment we cross this initial threshold the entire crisis becomes doomed, and the utopia we have been searching for would be discovered to already be here. We already have far more than we need in practical terms to support full and radiant happiness in all people, so surplus abundance would be the future we all walk into right from the start. All ideological conflicts would gradually dissolve in light of the underlying drivers of those fractures having been removed at their roots. Humanity is already unified, we have merely been disrupting it in an extremely dynamic and persistent way.

As I say, you really do need to account for the absurdity of the scale. But that does not in any way mean it isn't correct, so you also need to account for this. The possibility really is there, regardless of who points to it, even if nobody gets together to initiate the great cascade indicated. Just the fact that it exists is the big news. So if you want it, there it is. This was not previously known.

It is very disturbing. The entire prospect is absurd. I get it. This changes everything. We have been playing the wrong game, and that's why we haven't been winning. We've been looking at the whole thing upside down. Every form of typical sanity remains sane only up until the moment this lands on the table, then suddenly it's all madness by comparison. The entire consideration is so fundamental that it immediately crushes everything else down to nothing beneath its weight of implication. Especially when you consider how accessible it all is at a collective level. Really, if you are not moved by it, then you simply haven't really seen it yet. Either that, or you might simply not choose to believe it, but even that bit will no longer be optional beyond a certain point - and that point will be reached quite early on.

Obviously, the extreme depth and span of what is being indicated here needs to be taken into account in everything we say. There has never been anything like this before, and there will never be anything like this again, it is a one time event based on a very peculiar series of loaded tensions that will never again arise.

At the collective level it is like the bursting of a bubble in many ways, and the collective level is where everything will be happening. It has also been at the threshold between individual and collective that the entire thing has remained stuck for so long. And as I say - this cultural membrane may be very stubborn, but it will also pop shortly, as we edge up to and cross this pending threshold enough times.

Ultimately, there can be no small version of what is being proposed here. The very nature of what is being suggested is so dramatically staggering that it boggles the mind, and forces you to somehow try to accommodate something that probably can't really be accommodated. And for most people this will mean that they will balk at the idea, and perhaps rightly so. That might even be balanced under the circumstances.

And yet, that will not prevent it from unfolding exactly as defined, if only because it becomes effectively unstoppable very early on in the sequence of events, where just a few will be required to kick the entire thing off at the right level. And the ultimate scale of the downstream change associated really does have only one form: The whole shebang, as they say. There is no half version, no mildly affected world. It's just not that sort of thing. It will burn, and burn, until the entire forest of pain is gone.

This is, once again, captured in the same sort of 'bowl model', as in the 'law of the unstable middle' outlined above. There is no middle state, no slippery slope, no reasonable measure. This is not something we can have just a little of. And people get this wrong all the time. They imagine that there is some desire here to establish all of this in some small corner of the world, as some kind of divergent subculture or underground social movement. As if there is some wish for it to be 'popular' in some sense. But that is simply not what this is at all.

Sure, there may well end up being a whole lot of people crawling all over this before long, and yes for the most part that might generally be happening behind closed doors, but it is not as if that will be the purpose of the whole thing. That is merely the necessary prerequisite for what comes next. And what comes next is not going to be any kind of movement. It is also not going to be in any way covert. Moreover, if all of that cloistered development right at the start does not ultimately result in that great practical wave, then it was all worthless, and should certainly be abandoned. As I say - 2EQ is not a philosophy.

The cascading nature of what is being pointed to not only defines an inevitable scale in terms of ultimate downstream impact, but also explains the way the entire thing will remain seemingly dormant until the moment it is initiated. Which means this will either be nothing at all, as it has been until now, or it will be the biggest thing the world has ever seen. Yes, absurd! I know. But there doesn't seem to be much wiggle room here, all of this is simply implied. It will also transition between these two states very rapidly. Whatever brief incubation that occurs will only ever be very short lived, given how short the distance is between the right people getting hold of the framework and the same sort of people extracting the obvious applications associated for the first time, thereby kicking off the great wave to follow. And long before that, almost immediately, the seeds of the whole thing will have been sown in a way that will mean that it essentially can't then unhappen. The fuse will be lit right from the start, and probably in many more places than one, as indicated.

Indeed, by the time most people are reading this sentence, that will almost certainly have occurred in various locations. Which means the countdown will already have commenced. But all of that does still depend entirely on the capacity of the human collective to unite around an issue they can't currently even bring themselves to look at, let alone take seriously enough to result in any meaningful impact. And also to very rapidly move beyond the need for any further input from my end, which is where it has all been stuck for decades now.

Which is to say, and just to be clear here one last time - nothing I do now is going to result in the outcomes being defined. The time of the individual has come to an end here, and the time of the collective has begun. The right people were the final key, the last in a long line of lessons learned.

It turns out that there was a certain series of combined factors necessary in order to reach this most essential threshold, almost like the combination to a lock, and that if even one of these factors was missing then no dice - nothing will occur.

That combination is - comprehension, propagation, and conversation.

In this instance, that quite simple combination - even at the right level of audience - turned out to be particularly difficult to achieve without the need for direct intervention in the form of the initial 'orientation' that we have been pointing at. Which is clearly something of a burden on any kind of explosive potential here. But hey - if it works, it works. It is a very high threshold, but also one with a staggering downstream consequence if reached even once. So it didn't really matter how difficult it was, as long as we got there in the end.

The point being - this really is an end in a sense. For me anyway. I spent my entire life trying to figure out what else needs to come from me in order to get the part that needs to come from you. But honestly, if this is not enough now then I'm really not sure I can help. This is where it has all come to now, as we reach this final crossing over point.

This is why those few matter, and why finding them becomes the key. And also why spending energy on anything else should probably be avoided now. In essence, the biggest thing ever has remained trapped by an inability of most people to overcome the internal pressure of the very thing being defined, which leaves them blind to all this by definition. That is its purpose after all. And in most people it is working. So the key now is to simply avoid all of those people who have the 'stable' form of the disease, and instead to make the information available to only those who are able to look, and in a form that is most effective. We simply need to do what works, until something better comes along.

In the end you cannot make people capable, and you cannot make them interested. Not in this context. This particular information is unique. That has been the lesson here, a hard won truth. There needs to be some cracks in the armour already, where at least a little bit of light is creeping through. And you can't create these cracks, but you can select for it, and thereby preserve your own sanity.

I suppose this is lesson number one if you want to be a lion tamer - don't try to fight the lion in any kind of direct way. And that's what I did, which was madness.

In the end it was not the dragon that killed me, it was the fear in the hearts of the other villagers. That's what has torn me to bits, and that is still doing so today, to whatever degree I am forced to confront such. But now that we see this far narrower approach emerging I am left with gratitude instead, for the few who are capable. We only need a few, so why bother with all the rest?

For years I got this part completely wrong, as I sought to somehow overcome this issue in people, without ever realising just how narrow the initial audience might actually be, and how easy those few will find it. In the end I started to get downright hostile, as you can see above, like a lifeguard who was suddenly being overwhelmed by the number of drowning people in the pool.

This was the thing I didn't really understand when I first wrote what you see in the addendum. I was somehow trying to accommodate the fact that I was going to need to talk to people directly, and the kind of hell that might be in this context - how to possibly make that a sustainable prospect etc. It all seemed impossible given what I knew at the time. But this is the thing - at that point I had only ever been speaking to the wrong people. 100% of the people I had ever shared any of this with were the wrong people. I was completely unaware that the right people even existed, or what might happen if I could manage to limit myself to that group only. I was not aware of the absolutely opposite effect that might have in my own life, or for the future of the event as a whole.

I never considered only having just a couple of people in the deep end with me at any given time, and also the possibility of choosing those people more carefully. It wasn't even a matter of putting up a fence, but more a matter of just keeping the whole thing on the hush hush. I didn't ever imagine that no active exclusion might be required if we target and invite the right people in the first place, and simply don't inform anyone else.

So for now, the main task will be to completely avoid all those who fall below the necessary threshold and to narrow the whole thing down to only the few who have the highest chance of finding exactly what they are looking for here. We need to find those few who are absolutely going to love this, and to completely give up the idea that anyone who doesn't will be able to be swayed. That is simply futile.

Beyond that - beyond finding them - the aim will simply be to achieve this basic 'capture' for them. Which, unless this very rough attempt does manage to achieve basic comprehension in a few very receptive people, still means having this chat with me right at the start. It all seems a little absurd until you see what's at stake, then it seems like a very small price to pay.

So the only time we might ever need to engage with anyone now at a level lower than 'capture' having already very clearly been reached, would be if they were sitting down with the express intention of reaching that point. I.e. in the 'orientation' chat. But that first nutshell really isn't that onerous, and it can be quite fun to see the implications dawn on people for the first time. So that shouldn't really be a problem.

Sooner or later we might even be able to achieve that initial comprehension in some recorded or written form, and that will be an interesting moment. We may have even gone some way towards that here, or at the very least managed to get all of those who naturally qualify to a point where interest might outweigh aversion in that sense. But yes, in some cases we might even have reached this point of capture here already, without any need to chat at all. In which case - for those people - the bigger books will suddenly make a whole lot more sense. Indeed, if this happened to be true, then realistically the chickens have already flown the coop here now.

This is the absurdity of the whole thing. The information required in order to set off this entire chain of events was already captured in the very first draft of Organic Psychology decades ago, and in every version since - it's just that people have never been able to put that puzzle together by themselves. Not without help. But maybe now they could, assuming they were competent enough intellectually.

The worst thing ever becomes the best thing ever the moment people rise to the demands associated - just like being able to keep your head above the water in the deep end of the pool. So this is what we will be checking for now. For anyone who can actually swim in this sense, having the pool to themselves will be fantastic. As I say - the best thing ever. And only those people matter at first.

So what happens next?

You happen. There are only the right people now, and how to find them. All we need to do is throw this little spark into a few carefully selected haystacks, and see what happens. So if anyone finds themselves being invited, then clearly someone they know thinks they are a rare individual. In which case I guess they could take that as a compliment. And we can only hope that the assessment was broadly accurate in at least a few instances, and that all of this turns out to be exactly what some have been looking for.

Truly, for the right people, nothing but this will suffice. They will have been waiting for this their entire lives. In which case I will be very happy to share whatever I can, for as long as I can, in order to open that entire territory up for them. For whatever that's worth. I know it isn't pretty, I clearly can't write to save myself, but I have done what I could, having now given it everything I have.

The only thing that matters now is whether any engagement is above or below the essential waterline here. It really is productive only above a certain level of audience, and once you take it off the page and bring it back into a two way exchange of some kind.

Some boats float, and some boats don't. This is what we've learned. And there is no longer any effort expended in bailing out boats that are basically sinking right from the start. That was the mistake. If they sink, let them sink. Those who won't talk don't matter.

It is all about those who are at least curious enough to look, and to do that in an openly collaborative way. But just to be clear - it is not as if anyone is being invited to actually do anything. Not at first. The initial steps here involve only a kind of mapmaking. There is no movement of which we are seeking to make anyone a part.

The deeper task associated is very real, but that will not be necessary for these first few, who merely need to examine the whole thing for those who come next. There is no onus beyond that, and people often get this wrong. We are only looking. That's it. Done and dusted. There is no 'path' associated, not unless that happens to ring your bells, and you decide to hang around for the next stage.

I suppose there will be a few freaks who want to travel along this entire chain of events, hopping from one to the next, but that will not be necessary at all. And in many ways the beginning stage is the best of all - all power and no responsibility. To just look and then step away, free of all further onus.

What comes next will then come next regardless, the moment we shine that light on the territory associated. The 'right stuff' for that next level will be an entirely different recipe, where you see people not only with the necessary intelligence, but who also embody the courage required to act on what they see. Those people are going to change the world, and deserve all the support we can offer. And those people won't need to be told twice, they will simply take to all of this like a duck takes to water.

For more information see -
2EQ.org