

Anyone who knows me will tell you that for the past 30 years, my entire life has been dominated by a single, all-consuming obsession. However, it is very likely that none of them would be able to explain to you exactly what that obsession is. All of which has resulted in a rather strange situation, but as we will see, there are also several good reasons for this.

It turns out that I made a couple of very significant mistakes in relation to this event, and that those mistakes pretty much cost me my entire life - at least up until now - thereby resulting in many years of solitary confinement and hard labour, and with very little to show for all that.

Therefore, my simple aim here will be to explain what this event is, what those mistakes were, and then to roughly sketch out what changes now that those errors have suddenly become so clear. Hopefully, the difference in approach will be quite dramatic.

To demonstrate this shift and what it might mean now, I was sitting down for breakfast with an old friend recently, chatting away about all the typical stuff - the state of the world etc. In particular this was someone who was already broadly aware of what I was working on, but like most people close to me had never really grasped the true nature of it. The few times we had attempted to broach the subject it all fell completely flat, and I suspect he didn't enjoy that process much.

The point, however, was that by the end of about half an hour on this particular morning he had already fully grasped what I was basically saying, and was also very keen to know more. And not only to know more himself, but to somehow make sure others might also get a chance to take a much closer look.

It went something like this -

“Oh! That's what you've been saying all this time? Shit!”

“Yes, is this not exactly what I've been saying??”

“Yes! It actually is, but I just didn't get it..”

“Can you see what it might mean?”

“Of course, but how could this possibly be true? And if it was, how could we just be sitting here talking about it, rather than doing something about it?”

This response was completely bizarre to me. I honestly didn't really know how to reply. Was he actually getting it? And if so, then how?

How could it be that I had already explained so much, and that he apparently heard not a single word of it before, but that suddenly and in very brief order his eyes were wide with both interest as well as apparent comprehension?

I could tell this same story a few times here now, with various different people involved, and always with the same basic outlines. Whether in conversation or in writing, the result was always a bit like catching a deer in my headlights. And it never went anywhere as a result, if only because several key things were missing - something that is about to change here now. Just the fact that people are seemingly grasping the essence of what is being proposed is completely new, and for me quite a shocking turn of events.

Anyway, the conversation that morning immediately led into the most obvious and appropriate of questions: What next? Where to from here?

When I posed this as a question to him, as in - "if you knew something this big, and this important, and this urgent, what would you do next?" he suddenly had a sort of epiphany.

"I would tell people. I would write it all down and share it with them. I would do whatever I could to capture the most critical details and make them available to people everywhere."

"Oh shit, that's exactly what you have been doing, right? For all this time?"

"Yep."

"What the fuck!"

"Yep. But look a little closer, and consider the core insight and where it lies - what would happen if you simply ran around yelling about it and broadcasting it into the world?"

"Oh, I see.. nothing good at all, but lots of bad stuff for sure! Actually, really, I definitely wouldn't do that... all of that would need to occur in some sort of very controlled environment."

That was the eventual conclusion he landed on, and I certainly agreed.

The entire conversation then wandered off into the particular nature of the very strange situation, why people don't hear it, how epic in scale it all is, and eventually what all of that might mean for the way things move forward.

Suddenly he wanted to know more, but also immediately began to notice the peculiar anatomy of the situation, and how dangerous learning more about it might actually be. Even in the cafe we were sitting in I noticed we were both looking around occasionally and sort of whispering a bit. This is always when I know people are beginning to understand. They also can't generally stay sitting down.

"Well shit".. he said.. "So where does it go from here, then? What next? And how can I help?"

This is the right question. At last. Finally someone had grasped both the nature and the scale of what is being proposed, and most especially that they might somehow play a part.

Anyway, I then pointed out just a couple of the many very curious factors that together have some bearing on the situation at this stage of its unfolding, and how they tend to project forward under various scenarios.

Inevitably we ran out of time, but the whole encounter did leave me thinking. What had now changed here? And what did that mean for everything that must come next, in the wake of that opening?

We had both agreed that, at the very least, there really should be somewhere that anyone who was interested in this subject matter could go to both explore and to chat about it - but what possible form might that take? How could that be structured, and what might someone need to know before they stepped across a threshold like that?

Roll forward a couple of months, and this is what you are looking at now. I'm going to explore this new path here a little, by first of all explaining what it is, but also by providing a place for people to meet and discuss such things further if they wish. I'm also going to make you a very limited offer here, in case it interests you. We will explain this also, by the time we reach the end. The document you are reading now is not an openly published manifesto, it is merely a private invitation to sit down and briefly chat about all of this at some point, if you wish. It should therefore remain strictly confidential at this point, at least in this intimate and casual form.

So anyway, what I am going to do here is basically seek to follow the same broad sequence, and see how we go, if you are interested. Maybe you will suddenly grasp it also?

But before we can do any of that, I probably need to go backwards here a little, before we go forwards. After all, you likely don't have any idea what I am even talking about here, right?

There is a bit of foundational context to establish first. And as I say, this was the part that my friend was already broadly aware of - he already had the basic pieces that were able to suddenly fall into place that morning. By which I mean - without those background aspects I don't think our conversation would have gone the way it did. He already had the basic framework, and had also seen the impact in my life of 'something' massive over time, even if he could never really figure out what that might be. The scale and implications of my relatively simple claim had never really dawned on him fully until that day, when suddenly it all fit together in a sudden clap of recognition.

So as I say, I will stop here and go back a little, to fill in those basic outlines for you. Please bear with me here, however. It's sort of a long-winded joke.

One thing that takes a bit of getting used to is the epic scope and depth of what is being pointed out. Nobody ever gets it at first. But hopefully it will be worth the journey, as we make this brief climb up to where we can see the whole thing.

More importantly, this is just a bit of housekeeping to get things on the right track - you will now be able to poke around and ask questions for yourself, and maybe even chat about it all in person if you wish, if this small bit makes any sense to you at all. That will be up to you.

Here we go then, I will just jump right in. This is the basic context that I didn't need to explain to my friend that morning, if only because he had heard this part before:

There is something going on in the typical individual (yes you) that is causing a massive amount of distress and conflicted confusion if it is not actively contained in some way, and a fair amount of distortion and internal conflict even when it is.

That event is essentially a process of active repression that can appear quite stable if it is managed in a more sophisticated way, but many people cannot cognitively afford such, even when the culture they are immersed in offers patterns that work for some. And of course this idea is not new, but we are not only speaking about the 'shadow' as psychology might frame such, that being the ego's emotional blind spot, but a far broader and more active functional event that crosses over into many levels of life - including physical states, as well as the way we manage relationships, finances, beliefs, and circumstances in general.

Either way it is vast, dynamic, and complicated - but it is also just one thing at the end of the day. But precisely because of all the confusion and mess it creates, it has also never been able to be separated from the underlying functioning - like a climbing plant that has wound its way along every branch and twig, and that mimics the natural plant beneath, as it gradually strangles it to death. And this failure to differentiate the two events means that any attempt to prune the problematic event also ends up pruning back the natural underlying healthy functioning in most cases, leaving an impossible bind, and an endless cycle of struggle and confusion.

It is not that complicated, not in essence. It's just that we can't see it, precisely because it is true. This singular concealment, along with the scale of the event implied, is also the solution to almost every one of the deepest issues we face - which makes the possibility of being able to clearly differentiate it a watershed event. After all, due to the nature and location of this particular issue, it means that until we can differentiate it in some sort of comprehensive manner, we are forever looking from it, rather than at it. And this is where we have been stuck.

The event in question produces an enormous amount of distraction and intentional confusion, kind of like how a tiny octopus can nevertheless make a huge cloud of ink in the water in order to hide itself. And because clear and open awareness is the central issue in this case, the 'ink' in this instance is all geared around distraction and concealment - resulting in all the crazy and very colourful stuff that people tend to believe about themselves, and about the world at large, much of which is actually quite spurious, if not outright false.

I will labour this metaphor to death in what follows, as I refer to this event as 'this octopus', if only because this thing is so completely banished from general cultural awareness that it does not even have a name - so we will just stick with the first one that comes along, until something better is agreed by all. Octopus is shorter than 'subversive functional agenda', and the event in question also has a few similarities that make that metaphor quite descriptive, such as many limbs, the ability to evade capture, and the ability to hide in plain sight. The only part that doesn't really fit is the part about it being small - so when we get to speaking about the wider moral and social and practical implications we will tend to more appropriately call it the 'elephant'.

Anyway, back to the ink - There is really no end to the mountains of obvious bullshit we might generate just to obscure a couple of hard or uncomfortable truths, and so it is that the world becomes full to the brim with totally meaningless psycho-social garbage. And that is only one small facet of the event being indicated.

The point is - much of that is not just natural error, it is intentional subterfuge. We are literally driven to make up fantastic stories about ourselves, and about the world around us, just in order to keep ourselves emotionally afloat - and if ever anyone makes the mistake of questioning those fictions we generally attack them with great ferocity. And the same is true for all the many physical imbalances this event produces (think of the proportion of illness that is essentially self-induced based on voluntary lifestyle choices). They can be incredibly resistant to change.

And even in that quite simple and obvious context we begin to see an interesting question - are those negative lifestyle choices (and the very unhealthy outcomes associated) really voluntary at all? Or is there something deeper going on, something that is effectively forcing people's hand? What if there was? And what if that deeper thing might be able to be dramatically mitigated, or even completely resolved? How might that impact general health over time, assuming that this change would require zero willpower to maintain?

Did that just stretch your credulity a little? A little ambitious as a claim? Well hold onto your hat in that case, because that isn't even half of it. The impacts on health are only one limb of the metaphorical octopus we are going to be trying to capture here. The impacts on other areas of life can sometimes be far worse than that aspect.

It is all quite natural in one sense, once you see how it works, but it is also functioning to conceal a very profound truth, and an even more significant potential. And this is why we have started off here talking about the parts of this event that influence the formation of belief and imagination, even though that is only one small part of the total event - there is actually a way out of this bind, if even a few people are able to work together on such, but all of this fairytale noise is preventing us from even seeing how this trap actually works, let alone reaching for such an option in any constructive manner.

In particular, talking about this subject ends up being one of the deepest and most pervasive 'social taboos'. Which in turn also means that only a very sober and hardy minority will ever be much use on the path it all indicates at first, and that for most people the whole thing will remain firmly beyond their own conditioned sensitivities. Most people will not be interested to even look, and would not be capable of seeing it even if they did look.

Here we see just a couple of the defining characteristics of something that has come to eclipse my entire life. First of all there is the scale, and the nature. It is huge in terms of its implications, both individually as well as collectively. But then it is also completely hidden, and not only passively. This event itself is a roaring emotional and psychological rip tide that immediately sweeps away any hint of shared insight into its nature, or even its very existence in the first place. And this is all expressed both inwardly in the individual, as well as reflected outwardly, in terms of culture.

Consider, then, that the world we see today is nothing but the external expression of this inward conflict in all the people who make it up - an invisible conflict essentially - and that this dynamic has not been noticed precisely because of the activity itself. What would it look like if there was something going on that essentially placed artificial limits on emotional fulfilment, and that also produced all manner of mysterious impulse and tendency?

The result would be perpetual hunger (inwardly), massive overconsumption (outwardly), and confusion and conflict (everywhere).

Is that not what we see? Is that not what is destroying the planet, and why hundreds of millions of people are on antidepressants, or less regulated drugs, despite being drowned in material success?

All organisms we see today evolved in a very demanding context of competition and scarcity, a continual fight for survival in a harsh and dangerous environment, and we were certainly no exception. So how might any of those experience 'winning the lottery' as we have done? I suppose you might look at the typical house cat for some idea - constant lazy bliss.

But not so for us, and why is this? Far from being in the same deep water as other animals are in, and in which we evolved to swim, we modern humans are essentially lounging around in a paddling pool - and yet somehow still struggling not to drown, even in just an inch of water. It is because the problem is not originating from without, it is all coming from something that is going on within us.

The complex being indicated is a vast and sprawling event, an entire functional agenda, and all of that is geared around the subversion of a very particular aspect of natural and healthy internal functioning. And I realise this will be difficult to accept or even really grasp at first glance, but please take a moment to also consider just how much this might explain, as well as how much hope it might offer.

What if there really was an event occurring within all of us that was like an invisible millstone around our necks, and what if that could not only be examined, but in the wake of that courageous awareness might even be able to be removed?

What would be the next thing to do, if that really was the case? Explore it a little?

So what do you think would happen if ever you tried to point it out to anyone?

I mean, think about it this way: if you are 'moving left', and if everyone around you is moving left also, and if every song on the radio is about moving left, then moving left can seem like standing still. But actually, if all of that is based on a lie that we are all collectively telling ourselves, and each other, then if anyone simply tells the truth for once then what will happen? Just by doing nothing at all, which is to say just by standing still for once, that person would appear to suddenly 'move right' at great speed - toward the greatest cultural taboo there is - and thereby immediately breach every social covenant we live by as a culture.

And who would be right in that instance? The person telling the truth is always right, of course, even if that makes people uncomfortable. After all, that's what the truth means.

But how would everyone perceive that person? They would, therefore, immediately be attacked as a reprobate - as deeply insulting and offensive, perhaps even aggressive. And yet, they would be the one in the right, and any attack such a truth-sayer received from culture as a result would not actually be justified as 'self defence' as people in that culture might imagine - it would be first blood, and could rightly be responded to by that person as such.

We have a blind spot, then. A big one. And right in the middle of that blind spot we find the reason for the blind spot. But we only find that if we have the courage to look.

What it essentially means is that what we currently consider 'normal' human functioning is not our natural functioning at all, but an artificial and distorted pattern that includes a massive and tangled body of subversive behaviour. But because this added event causes so much mess and confusion, it has obscured the natural underlying (much simpler) functioning from view, meaning that this resulting dynamic puzzle has come to be seen as 'just what it means to be human'. But this is not actually the case, and as soon as you see the anatomy associated - when you are then able to separate the natural from the added - an entire hidden world of possibility suddenly opens up.

So I need to stop here just to make sure you are not misunderstanding what is being proposed. I am not speaking about only some people here, and I am not indicating anything merely trivial in nature. What I am literally suggesting is that our entire view of ourselves contains one very serious omission or misconception, we have somehow managed to overlook a staggeringly significant event, and most likely not because it is so small, or only present in a few people, but precisely because it is so big, and in everyone.

You don't like that idea? No doubt. But you really do need to look at it all a little closer before you reach any final determination in that regard. The point in this case is that merely grasping what is being claimed requires a certain critical mass, so until you at least reach that level of capture you can't even argue about it in any informed or rigorous way. So I will keep going here for now, in the hopes that we might reach that important milestone at some point along the way.

For now, however, it might be worth considering that at least some of your immediate responses to this information might not be anything other than the very thing being described. And yes this is a very disturbing thought, but you must admit that this is also entirely plausible given what we just outlined.

It turns out that the problem, and the answer, were both standing right in front of us all along - so close we couldn't see them. It is even tempting to say that we have been blind to this entire issue, but it is even more dramatic than that. The issue being described is itself a form of active blindness - that is its very function, its entire purpose for existing. And this event is not only hidden within the individual, but the avoidance associated with it has also come to be very deeply reflected in the way we have arranged ourselves collectively.

I realise that the full implications of this simple claim will not yet be clear to you, but it is really not that complicated in essence. Something very important has been hidden right under our noses, something far bigger than anyone might expect, and merely pointing it out in a way that cuts through the heavy emotional armour indicated represents a sort of explosive threshold.

Two things matter here, above all else -

First of all, that this entire secondary event can be removed. And secondly, that making this potential available to the average person on a reliable and accessible basis will require collective development and effort.

What does that mean? It means that there is a very dramatic potential for a type of change that nobody has ever considered possible, and that this possibility is not even very far away - it is simply very well concealed. And, therefore, that all you would really need to do is point it out clearly enough and the entire ball of string would begin to unravel. It stands to make a very deep and lasting difference, both individually as well as collectively - as well as very rapidly, and also permanently.

The type of change associated will not be able to be stopped once it has begun, and the resulting state will not need to be maintained once it has occurred. Even the process itself will not need to be pushed on anyone, or even explained to them. People will literally be climbing over the top of each other to get to it, and they won't even really know what it is, or need to.

We are also not talking about something to believe here, even if that belief happens to be based on evidence and challenge. That part may be important for a few, but not for the many. At that far broader level we are discussing a direct and very profound process of deep level personal change that, most importantly, does not require deep level personal understanding.

•

Perhaps we could stop here for a moment just to capture what we are saying in a more practical sense. What are we talking about, exactly?

From the negative view, based on the problem being the main focus, what we see is a dynamic and very powerful process of active subversion in relation to the normal and healthy functioning of the natural human system (you), and that the activity of this underlying complex produces a mysterious and ongoing obstruction to the achievement of fulfilment in life. In real terms this means that the emotional landscape is being dynamically manipulated so as to maintain a certain hidden agenda, and that the byproducts of this activity are all manner of impulse and tendency that can cluster into various obvious forms at times, but may also be extremely dispersed and pervasive.

It can take many forms. In most people, the result of this activity is first of all a kind of disorientation in life, in the sense that it spins your compass and leaves you wondering which way is up, and where you are heading. This can express itself both as the absence of positive drives, but just as often as the presence of self destructive behavioural patterns. All of which can cause a degree of confusion and mayhem at a transactional level of life, and often outward conflict or just plain inertia.

At a purely internal level the results are much the same - with many people essentially abandoning the 'outer' search for fulfilment in an attempt to go directly to the source in a sense, but that does not work out to be any better in this instance, given the nature and origins of the real issue. The exact same deadlock exists inwardly, with all the external conflict and confusion merely being a reflection of that inward conflict and confusion.

This slippery and dynamic and generally highly concealed subversion is what the core anatomy at the heart of this emerging paradigm begins to lay bare. At last we see an explanation for all the confusion and conflict, and not only in general terms, but in quite explicit detail. We see all the various forms the entire thing can adopt, and also how stable the whole event is. What at first seems unfathomable in its complexity suddenly begins to look much more like the workings of a vast machine, or - as I say - an ongoing dynamic wrestle between two opposing organic events.

This anatomical insight, in turn, immediately begins to inform and empower influence over all of this activity, leading ultimately to the conclusion that not only can all this conflict be better managed in light of a far more comprehensive appreciation of what is really going on beneath all the surface level confusion - but also that it can be undone entirely under certain (currently rare) circumstances. It also becomes immediately clear that this possibility would essentially be equal to the sum of all lesser so called 'solutions' that people apply to the problem of human life in general - like a kind of 'king hit' that ends the entire war in a single stroke.

Once you see this possibility, making that rare occurrence commonplace immediately steps into the light as the only really rational option, it is even fair to say that it becomes a supreme moral imperative.

The whole thing therefore needs to be checked out in great depth, just to make sure it isn't totally bogus. After all, the very last thing you want is a supreme moral imperative floating around if it is not actually grounded in reality, or in the highest good.

In any case, the detailed anatomy is the key, but it is also the challenge. It is the key to the true nature of the real problem, and it is also the key to the detailed functional anatomy of the solution. It solves the puzzle of human life pretty much entirely, but here is the kicker - only if you can look. But people can't. And therein lies the rub, as they say.

Something this big was always going to come loaded with an equally epic catch, and the location and nature of this particular hurdle is a true mind bender. People cannot even begin to fathom the scale or even the nature of the solution this emerging anatomy indicates as a potential, because they cannot even begin to examine - or even accept the existence of - the problem that solution purports to address. After all, keeping all of this activity away from conscious awareness is the entire purpose of the vast body of activity being indicated - and very few people have ever managed to resist that powerful undertow.

Therefore, the so-called solution being proposed comes as a complete shock to most people in that most people don't even know they have a problem. I mean, they suffer all the symptoms of it, but not in any sort of conscious or self-aware sense. Which means that when it comes to discussing the detailed anatomy of the problem, most people will inevitably start off looking from that, rather than at that, and as a result will generally spend most of their time dramatising it, rather than examining it. It's like having a pill that makes people immediately vomit, right in your face, which in turn makes any sort of constructive dialogue almost impossible.

So yes, the immediate response is that it just can't possibly be right - and it can't be that big. But why not? If something that big has essentially been standing right in front of us the whole time, then your obvious argument might be this: we would have seen it!

But for that argument to stand up, you would first need to look, right?

So can you? And what do you see if you do? I suppose you will have a chance to find out here.

My basic assertion here is that you will actually have a great deal of trouble seeing it, and not only because it is being explained in a confusing or inadequate way. Indeed, the more clearly it is explained, the more difficulty you will have, precisely because it is true.

•

Does it all sound just so incredibly bleak? This is always the immediate perception, but is it really negative to explain to someone that yes they might be a bit ugly, but that they actually have leprosy - especially if you are holding the cure in your hand? In that case, if it can be removed, and if the entire thing was not previously understood to even be a distinctly separate event - then the worse it is, the better, right?

This is an extremely positive insight, but only if you are prepared to accept that you may indeed be suffering from the issue being indicated, and also be prepared to take the steps required in order to address it.

So this is a dividing line here, the first of many - if you can't accept that you have the disease, you are automatically excluding yourself from the cure. It is like a tax for arrogance and conceit. And even here we may be starting to trim our audience down a little, a process that will repeat a few times before we reach the end.

It may not be entirely obvious what the underlying problem with life is, but for anyone with even a modicum of honesty there is at least no doubt that a very serious issue does indeed exist. So for those people alone we will seek to explain it here, all the rest will not be interested, which is ideal in this case. We can just let all those sleeping dogs lie.

The perfect trap, then, is the one you don't even know you are caught in. But the possibility of being in an invisible trap is also very easy to check once you do suspect something - you only need to try to move. You just try to look, and see what happens. After all, if there really is nothing there, then what possible harm could come of it? You simply won't find anything in that case.

It is a very strange situation, but it is also a kind of conditioned blindness that can be dispelled at a certain point of minimum capture, as I say, so we will seek to reach that point here by the shortest path possible.

•

Anyway, as we chatted away that morning, about the state of the world, this foundational view was already implied at my end as I pointed out the obvious futility of any kind of political solution to the deeper issues implied.

If the real issue lies at the level of individual desire, and if those foundations are in some sense corrupted or conflicted, then nothing you do at any more collective level will stand to make any fundamental difference.

But the equally obvious counter to this is that, even if this was true, it makes no difference at all to know all of that - not if nothing significant can be done about that causal event. So we are back to square one in that case, with all political solutions being defined by the individual, and with the individual basically being pretty fucked up, leaving politics - and by extension the world - pretty fucked up by definition.

And yet, something can indeed be done about this situation at the individual level - this has always been my point. Actually quite a few things can be done, but one in particular stands out above all the rest. But none of those are available for as long as the event itself remains so profoundly hidden. So to understand what that is, and how it works, and what it all might mean, you really do need to grasp the essential anatomy of this underlying event and how it impacts the typical life.

The point is - it is either true or not, and if it is not true then as I say - what is the harm in taking a look?

The problem, however, is that you already know this is true, at some level anyway - it is implied in the very nature of the revelation itself, assuming for a moment that it is correct. The entire event is the grandest of lies that we are telling ourselves, and each other, in order to conceal or avoid a singular very obvious truth. And we will get to the nature of that hidden reality in due course, but for now what matters is the cost we all pay for this perpetual avoidance and denial.

The whole thing is a delicate situation in one sense, in that for most people the full and spontaneous release of this particular body of active avoidance would immediately plunge them into a kind of existential shock, and basically result in emotional deadlock. They would essentially become paralysed with fear, and for this reason we see the main function of all those who see themselves as the 'shepherds' of society as being the maintenance of a kind of collective trance in a sense, as indicated above. And this is only natural, in that any movement in the opposite direction - i.e. towards exposing this concealed event - is always associated with plunging people into profound personal crisis. But actually this 'keep calm and carry on' ethic is completely misguided, especially if a far more significant resolution to our true underlying struggle is only to be found in more deeply examining the very roots of our suffering, rather than forever avoiding such.

It may be true that for most people that shallow remedy might work, but as a general rule this approach fails to accommodate the fact that at least some people might not be so feeble. It also fails to account for the possibility that the hurricane being avoided in this way may have an eye, where everything is totally calm, if only you can penetrate it sufficiently. As indicated, it is also to overlook the possibility of fundamentally resolving that issue at its root, rather than perpetually needing to push it under the carpet, so to speak.

Lying to yourself, and to others, is not as easy as it might seem at first. And yet, if everyone around you is doing that, telling the truth can also be rather costly. But which is worse?

To banish any aspect of natural awareness, within a system that is so fundamentally oriented around conscious awareness as one of its guiding principles, is always going to be a bit like trying to hold a beach ball underwater. It can be done, but it certainly requires constant effort and activity. It is simply not natural as a long term pattern, any more than holding your breath is natural.

So imagine a situation where you tried to hold your breath as much as you could, but then still tried to live as normally as you could... what would the resulting situation feel like?

This is the state of the typical person at an emotional level, and this is why we will often see a kind of volcanic crisis arising over time as people grapple with this underlying struggle - first emerging in childhood night terrors, then again strongly in teenage angst and confusion, but then also often at many other times over a lifetime, a sort of mysterious undertow that shifts and moves around as different mechanisms become fatigued and need to be replaced or compensated for by other forms of containment. But no matter which of its various forms it may take over time, it never really lets go.

Basically, this underlying event is very powerful, and also entirely unconscious, which means that for the conscious mind it is a bit like riding along on an elephant it can't see, one that is dreadfully afraid of one particular sort of thing in the environment - but that we are never informed about exactly what that thing is. Sometimes everything will be going along fine, and then at other times we will be plunged into sudden crisis, or swayed off course by an urgent and mysterious impulse or tendency, seemingly for no reason at all.

The many and varied forms that this concealment can assume also explain how many people will stumble upon a particular pattern that happens to work for them, and then imagine that they have found some sort of 'answer'. They will then often attract or join with a whole cohort of people who embody a similar pattern, and proceed to attack or disparage all those who display a completely different (and yet just as effective) pattern of coping, imagining that they are suffering from a completely different thing - when in fact they are all dealing with the exact same dis-ease, just in two of its many different forms. And we don't only call these various different groups clubs, or families, but just as often refer to them as 'countries'.

So whilst it sounds terrible even to contemplate the possibility of such a vast and dynamic event occurring in every person, it also represents remarkable unity in another sense, if only because we are all actually in the same boat together here. It also explains the true issue that lies beneath an almost endless list of longstanding cultural debates and philosophical conundrums. Are we good or are we evil etc. It completely answers this riddle, but not in a way we might ever have expected. It does not land on either of the answers provided there, but splits the pumpkin of 'we' instead. It implies that the 'we' in that question is not actually one thing at all, but two quite separate things, and that one of those things is not natural to us at all.

At this elementary point you will not really be appreciating just how deep of an insight this is, or how profoundly it penetrates (or perhaps even entirely resolves) the age old question of - "what is wrong with human life?"

Anyway, at this point in our conversation that morning, I brought up the subject of Sam Harris, and what an unbelievable relief it was for me to finally see such an open and unashamed (indeed patently heroic) demonstration of the potential I had been referring to for all this time.

I mean, when you do get to see the anatomy of this underlying crisis, which is sort of like a big granny knot that has been made out of the otherwise tidy knitting of natural subjective functioning, what becomes most obvious is that the whole tangle up is unnecessary in as sense, and certainly not intrinsic, which means, by definition, that it can be entirely removed.

Did I say that already? But really, you still won't truly be grasping the significance of what I am proposing. The event in question is a very big part of the life you know today, and you don't even realise it. You can't see it at all, even though you feel its presence in every moment. It could also be that you feel almost nothing at all due to its presence, that it has made you numb etc, but either way it is currently having a very powerful impact on your quality of life, and at the very deepest level. So the possibility of having that entire thing suddenly excised in some kind of thorough and permanent sense is not easy to imagine.

Once you see the anatomy of the event you can also see how it might be dramatically manipulated in many ways, and this is also true. There is tremendous possibility for 'taming this monster' in a sense, and thereby dramatically limiting its impact - and that is what most people generally aspire to in all of the highest and most developed culturally reinforced patterns of 'stable management' we see.

Of course people don't call it that, or even realise what they are doing as they propagate their own particular form of 'ideal culture and values', but once you see what's really going on the underlying dynamics become clear.

Many forms of existing culture contain sophisticated patterns of management that can immediately be seen as quite ingenious, even if those are the exception rather than the rule. But all of that subtle manipulation and control pales into insignificance beside the only really dramatic possibility this situation so clearly presents, which is the removal of the entire event, at its very root.

And this is what we see with Sam, or at least this is what I am going to assume. We also see this potential in others, and have done so for many years, but more often than not these people are just so incredibly weird or inaccessible - or just plain irrational - that it is hard to take them seriously, or relate to them in any natural way. So Sam is a very welcome exception in this sense.

(Note: in case you need some background here, simply search 'Sam Harris Lex Fridman' on YouTube and start with their very first conversation. There are hundreds of others, but Lex is a good introduction because he asks the right questions. You could also take a look at Sam's book 'Waking Up' on this same subject.).

In my own case this cultural absence of stable and accessible exemplars was always a serious burden in relation to the primary claim I was making. I had personally witnessed this stable transition from one state to another in several people close to me many years ago now, and also in a context that was deeply saturated in the reality of deep level personal change. But because most people did not have much awareness of such potentials in themselves, and also had no direct access to the evidence I had seen, they always struggled to even grasp what I might have been referring to when I indicated the possibility of any sort of 'profound and permanent process of personal change'.

And the friend I was speaking to that morning was no exception. Several times over the years he had eventually left off our various discussions with the idea that perhaps I could offer people a bit more of a 'personal taste' of what I was referring to. But as we will see below, this was itself to completely misinterpret the scale and nature of what is being proposed.

This was what shifted that morning as we sat there chatting away so casually, my friend finally began to grasp the situation more clearly - to see why I had never offered proof, and also why I was myself not claiming to be any sort of exemplar for the process being indicated.

The error was in grasping the true context, and also what it all might mean. He was thinking way too small, which is only to be expected here by the way - as you will see for yourself in a moment. The true context here really is beyond easy comprehension and belief. It is just that people sometimes fail to see the obvious implications of things - and how small causes can very rapidly lead to much bigger effects.

There really is something there, however, something extremely significant as it turns out, and about this part people like Sam are not wrong. They really do represent proof, for what that's worth. A very dramatic potential really does exist, and already lies within reach of those with extreme determination. It is just not what such people think it is, based solely on what it 'feels like' to experience that great liberation.

But yes, some people do stumble upon it occasionally. It is easier than flying, therefore. So really not that hard I suppose. After all, before the Wright brothers you did not see people occasionally fly, as if just by accident, without even knowing how they did it.

So it could be easier than that, but also quite similar in several ways, in that the possibility of flying was always right there in front of us, obvious in a sense, but that somehow our collective imagination had been trapped beneath a kind of historical blindness.

This was the spell that the first controlled and powered flight broke. It was a lot more to do with social imagination than any degree of technical prowess. And the rest we know - an absolute explosion of development followed that single initial practical demonstration.

The same will be true here in due course, if what is being proposed really is the case. We are all currently blind to what will, in hindsight, be seen as completely bloody obvious. We will all wonder how we missed something so big, and so close, for so long. And the subsequent development will explode in just the same way. After all, just like flying, the anatomy of the event here may even allow for more than one way to do it.

This potential is also far more significant than flying was, as you will see. And like powered flight the idea itself was quite simple, but it was a long way from 'first proof of concept' to the point where some old lady in a wheelchair could be flown across the Atlantic in affordable comfort.

And this is what people miss when they ask for some sort of demonstration - they are completely overlooking the magnitude of what is being proposed. I am talking about flying, and their immediate response to that is basically equivalent to asking me to run around the back yard with my arms out. That's simply not what I mean. This is a wholesale insight, not a retail one. And at this early stage it is only something you might be able to give to others, not get for yourself.

Changing the world was the whole point of the first powered flight, but in the sequence of things that was merely the downstream effect of upstream causes. It all started with a hunch, a dream about what might be possible, even though no evidence had yet been seen to confirm it. And yes, that hunch did ultimately need to be correct. But as with so many important breakthroughs, that proof only came once more than one person got involved.

That important step is the difference between Richard Pearse and the Wright Brothers, if success is measured by the effect each had on the future of flight, which in that case it must be. In that regard, Pearse was a complete failure, regardless of whether or not he ever got off the ground first in any controlled sense, which itself seems doubtful. There is certainly no solid evidence for such.

Really, if ever you wanted to have any positive impact on the world in that particular arena, you probably did need to have a few friends in that case (preferably at least one with a movie camera!). And I'm not poking fun at Pearse here, after all I will explain below that I made exactly the same mistake myself. So he is a salutary lesson. Things could easily have been so very different for Richard, if only he had been just a little more outwardly engaging. Because in the end powered flight was never a private pursuit, as he seems to have imagined - it belonged to all of us, and we were all very interested in it, even if we didn't realise that yet.

And the same is true in this case. It turns out that what everyone has been looking for was hiding in the one place they would never think to look, but that makes sense doesn't it?

Sam, then, has now become the fresh tip of a growing body of evidence for 'something' that is occurring in 'some' people, 'sometimes'.

Importantly - it is still only in rare people, and a rare event, one that still appears to be very difficult to reliably repeat in any subsequent individuals. Which makes the entire thing both incredibly hopeful, but also incredibly frustrating.

So why is it both so difficult to validate as a reality, as well as so incredibly difficult to repeat in any accessible or reliable way? Why can it not even be understood in any sort of practical sense?

Here we come to what I have been saying all of this time, and what I figured out all those years ago. The reason those people can't repeat that event in others is because they don't actually know what it is. And I'm sure Sam would strenuously resist this claim, and say that he knows very directly what it is, but that is simply not the same thing at all. Recovering from the flu does not make you a virologist.

The potential we are discussing here has had many names over the centuries, most commonly something that equates to what most people mean when they use the term 'spiritual enlightenment'. And if so, then yes, spiritual enlightenment is a real thing. That is the implication here. And it is apparently so profound that it does feel spiritual. But the real point here is that the terminology itself contains some very deep misconceptions, if only because it is not at all what people think it is. In particular, it is not 'spiritual' at all. But there is no point asking a heroin addict what heroin is - because they will just tell you what it feels like. You need an organic chemist for that - and hopefully one that is not high as a kite when you ask them. But we can come back to this part later.

The point, however, is that this secondary event is very real, and that it can indeed be both comprehensively understood, as well as entirely removed. In essence.

Hence, we see old Sam, and we see new Sam. And we see just how different these two are.

Likewise we see old Eckhart, and new Eckhart. And I think we can all agree we would not want to be old Eckhart. Or we could use a hundred different examples here.

So what about that essential process of transition? That final wrenching free from the octopus? What is that like?

If you listen to the stories that any of these teachers tell, it is obviously an extremely stressful moment, and rarely results in the stable outcome being proposed - not without dramatic external support. It is certainly not a freely available process at this time, not anywhere, or in any form - not reliably, or in any way that is openly accessible to a typical person. Not even close.

Nevertheless, every time we see one of these individuals emerge in the cultural landscape they immediately attract a horde of 'seekers' who will cluster around in order to somehow 'get' whatever those people 'got'. And this is not deluded or even erroneous in essence, after all the event being described is entirely real. It is just that those 'teachers' don't truly grasp its essential nature, not in the only terms that really matter here, and can therefore only make vague gestures in the direction of what they were themselves doing when it either gradually or suddenly occurred.

It is also not something those people 'got' in any sense, it is something they 'lost', and - as we indicated above - they have only a very limited grasp of what that event was even when it was there, and even less now that it is gone. All they know is what it feels like to not have it anymore, and that it definitely feels good.

•

For now, the important thing is to focus on what has always stood in our way here. One of the most perplexing aspects of the entire possibility we are discussing here is the very profound scale and depth of what it implies, and how something so incredibly epic could possibly have remained hidden, whilst at the same time essentially resting right in front of our eyes. But this brings us back to the central function of the event in question - which is to establish and maintain concealment.

With this in mind we see the significance of suddenly having an anatomical model that is capable of differentiating these two interlocking events in a powerful yet accessible way. The central shift we see here, as we seek to move from subjective captivity to objective clarity so to speak, relies on the complicated and dynamic anatomy of this sprawling added event, as it weaves itself through and around all of our healthy and natural functioning.

Without this key insight, and the anatomy associated, the result is only fusion and confusion, leaving a situation wherein any examination of 'human nature' is a bit like watching a black eel wrestle with a black octopus. Our resulting behavioural tendencies generally end up so complex and enigmatic that the best we can do is throw some sort of broad net over everything we see and call the resulting messy fugue 'typical humanity'. Which is only natural. This downstream confusion is very profound, in no small part because confusion is itself one of the primary aims of this secondary event. But what if you could poke the octopus in a very particular way and suddenly turn it bright yellow?

This will be the aim here. What you would see first of all, if you did this, is what the natural underlying functioning looks like once it is separated from the other conflicting event it had previously been fused with when viewed from the typical vantage point. This would not remove the octopus, mind you, that is another possibility entirely. But just seeing it in this way would very suddenly be a total game changer, if only because for the first time ever you would realise that what you are actually looking at is two things, not just one. And the number of questions that this suddenly clarifies is epic.

This hidden anatomy is what has been missing. We have simply had no way to figure out what has been going on inside the 'black box' of core subjective experience. It has remained a resounding mystery, even to those who have been able to significantly alter it in this way.

This also explains where the whole thing has been hiding - it is because you always need both the concealed anatomy of the added event, as well as a full outline of the underlying healthy anatomy, in order to functionally separate the two things. But in order to gain such insight, you first of all need to separate the two, which itself requires the anatomical details. So it was an impasse. As we say - a perfect trap. And this is the power that insight alone can deliver in such a situation, but also how such insight might be very hard to acquire.

And merely relinquishing that secondary event does not change this fact, as evidenced in all those who embody that transformed state. They did it, they really did find something very dramatic, but they really don't know how they did it, or even what it all truly means. And this is why the resulting state (new Sam) remains so enigmatic and mysterious, and yet somehow obvious in its clear simplicity.

I mean what is it? What does he have? What does new Sam possess that you do not? What are people trying to get, that he got, as they follow him around like ducklings?

Nothing. Nothing at all. It is the absence of something, you see, not the presence of something. That slippery octopus is simply gone, and what you are left with there is just the natural underlying functioning, unfettered and unencumbered with all of that complicated struggle at every moment. And this is the part that surprises some people the most - our true underlying functioning is beautiful, elegant, and free. By contrast, the version of humanity we see now, in almost all people everywhere, is a twisted and mutated mongrel of a thing. That is not humanity at all, not really. That is just what the simple loop of true humanity looks like when it is trying to escape from being tied into an infinite mobius knot - in that context it is an endlessly seething and writhing mess.

So what does someone who has managed to escape from this puzzle have that most people don't have? Nothing. Indeed, what you have is a lot more than what they have. And they can't even explain to you what that resulting state actually is, if only because doing so would require a full and comprehensive explanation of the event that was removed, along with the complete anatomy of the natural underlying functioning, which is not something presently available in any form - not anywhere. Really, they wouldn't even have this event to study, which in some ways makes these very brave people the least qualified of all to talk about it. So all they can do is explain the hole where it used to be, an empty cage, but what use is that to anyone if people are still dealing with a live one?

And this is what my mate had finally understood -

“So you're telling me you know what's in that black box?”

“Yep. I know exactly what's in there. Not only that, but I have actually been telling people for decades now, but they can't even hear it. You can put it on the table right in front of them and they still won't be able to see it. Why? Because it is true. That's why.”

And he couldn't argue. I had actually been saying it - I had even lived with him whilst writing two entire books about it - and yet even the most basic thrust of what I was getting at had remained a total mystery to him until that morning. Something had prevented him from seeing even the most basic context, let alone calculate the implications associated.

•

So what are those main implications? I mean sure, seeing all of this might be some sort of liberation in itself, after all it might certainly resolve a few very long standing cultural debates, but what about actually doing something about it?

The primary import associated with finally having a comprehensive map for what is actually going on (being able to functionally separate the eel from the octopus etc) is not only to be able to make sense of the typical situation, even though that is certainly a very real outcome. It is not even to be able to far more effectively manage and manipulate that octopus, even though that is also certainly a very real outcome in the wake of direct insight into its nature becoming available.

As I say - the main thing is what that revealed anatomy offers in terms of our collective ability to develop culturally constructed processes by which that entire event might realistically be removed in every individual, and most especially in a way that does not require deep understanding in the person concerned.

What does that mean? It means that we are discussing the theoretical underpinnings of a technology here, not any kind of belief system. I mean, you almost certainly don't understand how your cell phone works. And yet, you can still use it, right?

The same will be true here. And this also tells us who we need to be speaking to here in the first instance, and what the event actually is. It means that what is emerging here might in the first instance be perceived as being some kind of philosophy, but that's not really the case. You don't need to understand anything here in order to receive all the benefits associated. Not in the long run.

So take a look at any piece of technology - who produces such advancements for us? And what does that take? It all exists because a few smart people did all of that work for you, by very deeply understanding all of the processes associated, and then got together to package up all of the knowledge and insight in a form that allows you to access it in a very simple manner. And even though what we see here might be more accurately deemed 'social technology' the same basic principles apply.

At this point our conversation took another rather unexpected turn, as it confronted this particular 'what comes next' fork in the road. Or more precisely - 'who comes next'. The particular demands at this very early stage most definitely define such as not being suitable for everyone. Just like flight, the part that belongs to everyone will come later. From Wright Brothers to Jumbo Jets took pilots and engineers at first, not passengers. Bravery and insight came first. And even before all of that came various theories of aerodynamics - some of them wrong, but some of them also right, as we now know.

And we should stop here I suppose, just to capture this scale aspect more fully, in case you missed it -

Something quite mundane has been concealed, hidden in plain sight as it were. No big deal really - after all we are only talking about a single individual here. It's just that there are millions of those individuals. And yes that event is quite complicated ultimately, but in essence not so much. The basic idea, and the basic function, is not that difficult to grasp.

What that situation offers, by its very nature, is that one of the two defining events that produce typical human behaviour (and all of subjective experience) can be functionally removed, in its entirety. And also, that the scale, depth, and dynamism of this event is far greater than most people immediately comprehend.

Thus, when we see examples of this transition, we see a previous very conflicted and turbulent state, which is then suddenly replaced by serene and calm equanimity instead - and that this transition is essentially permanent. But the way we will be framing that event here is completely different to the way it is generally understood by all those in society who are actively 'seeking' this 'mysterious potential'.

For the most part 'personal growth' is conceived in terms of development - a process of upward refinement and sophistication, rather than downward relinquishment and surrender. It is seen as a careful climb of a difficult and challenging mountain of potential, rather than what it actually is in this particular instance - a massive and somewhat devastating landslide event where half the entire mountain simply falls away into the ocean.

Both the current stability of its presence, as well as the eventual permanence of its absence, are explained here completely once you see what is really going on.

The anatomy of this secondary event (the one being removed) defines it as being very similar in nature to a living organism. Thus, and like any organism, you can push it off balance to a certain degree, and it will simply rebound again. You can prune it, and it will simply interpret this as an opportunity to grow back over time - possibly even to become stronger as a result. But if you push it far enough off balance, especially in a way that strategically targets it at the very root, it will actually die. And after that? Well, let's just say it won't grow back again after that. That possibility would represent a sort of fundamental shift.

This is very simplistic language of course, in that the event we are discussing is not actually alive, not in any independent sense, and does not actually die. But the analogy basically fits. It is a sub-function that is arising within the context of a much larger body of organic functioning, and as such is still subject to all the same patterns and limitations. The basic principles are identical.

In any case, like a bubble - once it is popped, it doesn't generally come back to being a bubble again. Not in this instance. And it is not only that some kind of illusion is dispelled - as in "did you notice the octopus hanging on the lampshade?"

This is, seemingly, what many think this shift consists of, but that's not the main fulcrum here at all. And it is also not the illusion itself that represents the suffering associated, but another far more visceral body of functioning. Yes it's true that once you have the octopus pointed out you then can't unsee it again. But that does not remove the octopus. So that 'mere noticing' is only the shallow level insight.

This is demonstrated in the most elementary structure of the teachings most people offer in this regard, including Sam. The so-called 'illusion' at the root of all this trouble can indeed be pointed out relatively easily in any moment of profound self reflection and enquiry, which is then experienced as being a bit like turning a light switch off momentarily, only for the light to immediately come back on again the moment you remove your hand. And there is Sam, sitting there with his light switched off, apparently permanently.

These two things are simply not the same at all. So wouldn't you like to know not only what that central illusion is, but also what makes that relinquishment a permanent event?

Moreover, the illusion in question is not even the main issue in this context, so wouldn't you like to have a much more comprehensive grasp of all the downstream consequences of that illusion being active, and especially how to expedite the removal of all that mess?

Here is my basic claim in this regard: it is entirely possible to know exactly what achieves all of that, how it works, and in which direction you might best travel if you want that to occur. And this is how 'Understanding' trumps 'Realisation' - it is because realisation does not even result in understanding in the person who has had the experience, whereas true understanding in just a single individual might be all it takes in order to enable realisation in everyone - provided that understanding can be shared. So it is understanding that has been missing, and you will certainly see why if ever you find the courage and determination to take that path yourself.

This is also why I have always resisted the very strong temptation to cross this threshold myself - it is because it is very important that all of this does not come from someone who has already achieved that outcome state. It is all just so as to prove this point once and for all, and to thereby forever banish gurus to their true position in the scheme of things.

Why don't I like gurus? It is totally obvious if you take even a glancing examination: they do not actually deliver the product they are purporting to sell. Not ever. They are, therefore, representatives of a failed cultural institution. They are charlatans, basically. All of them. And people who keep showing up to a burger joint that actually only sells pencils are clearly none too smart also.

Which is not to say that gurus have bad intentions, it is only to point out the nature of progress, and how it often shines a pretty damning light on previously presumed 'knowledge'. I mean, when was the last time you went to a Doctor and sat there as they applied leeches all over your body?

The practices and teachings associated with this particular potential we see today, as we look back on them in the future, will be seen as not much different to that - well meaning, but almost completely misguided. All of which is made worse due to the thing they are pointing at being real, which makes their failure all the more openly egregious, because it undermines legitimate hope by falsely misrepresenting what is actually a very significant potential.

For centuries they have given a very real thing a bad name, so it is time to take it back. As with the rest of human progress, it is time for science to rip this very important aspect of life out of the hands of these fumbling religious clowns.

To be clear, however, I'm not talking about Sam in this context. That's what makes him so refreshing - he is a prime example of someone eminently rational, but who has - once again - been placed in a very strange position in social terms as he struggles to deal with an inundation of interest in something he can't actually offer. Honestly, I even regret using him as an example here, given how unbelievably awesome he is. Sam Harris for President! First contact with aliens? Call Sam!

So don't get me wrong here. It is the situation I am referring to, and that even someone as formidable as this cannot easily overcome the essential lack of critical anatomy required in order to truly fathom the most important dynamics associated. And sooner or later this absence, in the face of constant pressure, will corrupt even the best of us.

When one lit candle fails so consistently to light other candles in turn, thereby generating social inequality by default, the entire thing can very easily degenerate into a kind of 'worshipping of the flame', and thus regress into infantile emotional dependency. And in a sea of sycophancy, where everyone is immediately offering you a pedestal, humility can be very hard to maintain over time.

Really, and this is what I observed so clearly all those years ago - even those people who jump that threshold in this extreme way do not end up as happy as they might be, precisely because they are unable to assist others in repeating such an extreme feat. They then spend their entire lives seeking to achieve that end in others, in a completely futile manner for the most part, and they clearly think that this is unavoidable.

But here's the thing - it is not unavoidable. As I say, all of that is simply what being a doctor was like before the discovery of the germ theory of medicine. It was all right in front of them the whole time, the answer to all of it, but they just hadn't looked closely enough to see what was really going on. All the good intentions in the world don't help you much if a critical lack of insight means you are essentially left to feel your way around in the dark.

And this was the choice I had to make all those years ago, when I saw all the people I knew immediately become some sort of guru, as a dozen budding aspirants began hovering around them. That approach simply doesn't work, and we have thousands of years of evidence for this.

It all led me to the most devastating of decisions - instead of simply pursuing that possibility in myself, which certainly seemed very much within reach at that time, I would instead place myself at the back of the queue. This was my conviction then, and it remains the same today. Like the captain of a ship, I will be the last one off. That's what it means. I will never be happy, not until you are happy first. And this is why I am not very happy - even though my life is filled with purpose. It is a very stressful stance to adopt.

There is a saying - "You can only ever be as happy as your least happy child". So it is a bit like that, except that my own net includes everyone in this sense - the entire world. And let's just say that my doctor isn't terribly pleased with the outcome of my choices in this regard.

I could just let it all go, of course. I could simply walk away, quietly take that leap myself, and spend the rest of my life snowboarding. But really, I dare you to take a closer look and to tell me that saying nothing would be the right path to take here, given everything at stake, and how close we are to lighting the whole thing up.

Anyway, this is the path I have walked ever since. I will step over this threshold easily, just like you will, rather than clear it in some fantastically athletic high jump. Even though - as such an extreme person - that jump has probably always been within my capacities. That is not the point here. Because the very last thing the world needs is just one more fucking guru, not if it means that nobody can ever repeat what they achieved.

We have tried the much easier 'Path of Realisation' with almost no success at all, except in a few very rare cases. It is time now for just a few brave people to walk the much more demanding 'Path of Understanding' instead, and see what happens as a result.

It is all about this hidden geometry, the concealed inner workings of this great and complicated clock. It is all about the true mechanisms associated with lasting change in this sense, which direction that lies in, and what it truly demands. And in particular it is about the very significant difference that collective development will make in relation to how any individual might approach such a prospect, and how much more reliable and accessible that essential transition might become in the wake of such. There are factors at play that are simply not immediately obvious on the surface of things here, and if you are not taking those crucial aspects into account then you really do risk missing the point entirely.

And this would be my statement to Sam - if you look at what he suggests people do, and then juxtapose that with what he actually did himself, you will see they don't exactly match. And when he focuses on helping them with merely 'dispelling the illusion' that he is not completely missing the real event, but also not addressing the issue at its most fundamental root, which in turn shows up in the outcomes people experience when they follow that path.

It is simply not an approach that achieves the stable outcome being sought. That is like asking people to tug on green fruit, when actually the fruit will fall by itself once it is ripe - but apparently nobody has any idea what produces this essential 'ripening'. And he is just the latest in a long list of adepts who have valiantly attempted to assist people with reaching this outcome state. But actually, Realisation does not deliver that particular power - only Understanding does that.

Here is my very firm assertion in that regard - if you cannot reliably stimulate that outcome in those who ask you about such, or at the very least point clearly toward a process by which that might inevitably become a reality for all people, everywhere, then you do not actually understand it.

That type of simplistic mental injunction simply doesn't take you there, and now we see why. That path neither truly identifies this slippery octopus in the only terms that really matter (terms that help you actually get hold of the fucking thing), nor does it offer the foundations for collectively developing practical tools that might most effectively help to remove it.

In particular, what changes between the first time you learn to turn that light off, and the moment when it finally turns off permanently, and effortlessly? And what produces this particular movement? Just how many times you turn the light off?

No. This far deeper and far more visceral transition occurs as much in your liver as in your brain, and anyone who focuses solely on some sort of mental injunction as a method is by definition looking back on the path they took and completely overlooking certain things that were actually central to their own process.

This is what stands to change here, and this is what's at stake. It can be a lot to get your head around, and most people don't grasp it at first. A dramatic shift at this particular level, and in this location, would shift our entire perception of who we are. But that is only culturally, and in terms of how we see things. Which can of course make a huge difference, in that how you see things can dramatically affect how you relate to them over time. And this really is a massive and very fundamental shift in this regard - it literally splits the pumpkin of humanity right down the middle, and explains that an entire half is not actually authentic humanity at all.

It is an insight that will then flow from basic psychology right up through all of culture and history - it will take centuries for the philosophical dust to settle. But all of that is nothing beside the far more practical potential it all points to as its most obvious payload of implication and application. It is not only that this insight might reshape how we see the foundations of the world as a whole, but that one whole half of that foundation will fall away entirely. And yes, I realise that you will not be able to fully comprehend what I am saying here at this point, but all of that change is merely the downstream effect of this tiny upstream cause. It is all about this potential shift in the individual person, and how easy that might become if only we can gain some sort of reliable and shared insight into what that is, and how it actually works.

Once you see that possibility in the individual, then projecting it into the wider sphere is kind of an unavoidable step, it is not hard to imagine. Just think of 'old Eckhart, and all the confusion and struggle associated with that state of being. Then project that state onto 8b people all at once, and observe the result.

This is the world we see today.

Then consider 'new Eckhart', and the very obvious calm and clarity associated. Then project that state onto 8b people all at once, and try to imagine the outcome.

This is the world to come.

So we only need to change 8b people? That isn't a problem?

No. That's not a problem at all. That's not even the issue.

It is not easy to talk about this aspect at this early stage, if only because you don't yet really have the full anatomy of what is gradually being pointed out here. But in order to understand the loaded impetus that is built into this situation, you really only need to notice what all of this means in terms of the potential implied, and where that is located.

So consider for a moment the possibility that all addiction (including all religion) is merely a compensation for some deep pain that is festering away beneath the surface of our emotional landscape. What if a huge amount of behaviour and thinking is geared around maintaining a kind of perpetual distraction from a thundering existential dread that is forever seeking to press itself upward and into the light?

Then think about how good some of those distractions and stimulated potentials feel - the high associated with every form of addiction etc, the 'ecstatic feeling' you might get as a result of pushing that existential wolf away from your door for a while.

What might the ultimate 'super addiction' feel like, during the 'high' stage?

Now consider the implications of being able to dig that core pain up and entirely undo it instead. It is implied in the mere anatomy of such a potential that this would basically represent the identical emotional effect as that 'super drug' addiction, except with zero side effects, and zero loss of mental acuity. Actually it would also increase all such positive functions, as well as being almost entirely free to access. In this sense it could even be that this deeper potential is itself the thing that all of those addictive substances and behaviours are merely mimicking in some shallow or narrow way.

Once again, I appreciate that you will have no way to calculate the significance of this possibility without having a comprehensive grasp of the anatomy associated, but even at this stage it is worth noting the location of the event this insight brings to light.

What if most human unhappiness and confusion is not coming from outside us at all? And what if it can be addressed directly, with almost no external change required? And what if just a few might be able to unleash that potential for everyone?

It really is a very profound consideration.

The key thing is that the whole possibility was merely hidden. So it's not that we even need anything more, only the combination to the lock. We already have all the ingredients right where we stand, so the right sequence will basically travel faster than a pandemic, if only because it will essentially be information based. And I'm guessing that nothing will 'go viral' as fast as the possibility of "deep and permanent happiness - for free".

So what would happen if you made that sort of practical application openly available?

Imagine for a moment that you got together with an intelligent and dedicated few, and managed to put together the first fledgeling process by which a small collective was able to take any typical individual (or even an exceptional individual in the first instance) and reliably stimulate this relinquishment in that person. And also, based on further refinement and development, if this could then be repeated - again, and again - as many times as required. And with every success that this process would become stronger, more efficient, and more fully understood.

What would occur at such a point?

I mean, what happened after the Wright Brothers made that film? And could any of that have been stopped once that confirmation threshold had been crossed in such an unequivocal manner?

You would be spitting out people from the back end of this process who are very significantly different from those people when they went in the front end. And this difference would be very obvious.

Really, you only need to meet one of these people to know what I am referring to in this regard. They are generally very different to the way they were prior, and are also never the same again. They are also very obviously having a much better time than you are.

I remember seeing a friend of mine standing at the kitchen sink, and suddenly groaning quietly to himself, arching his head back in a moment of obvious ecstasy. But no, he did not just have an orgasm, at least not as we would generally understand such. He had merely eaten a grape. More to the point, there were a lot more grapes left in the bunch he was holding, so that was just the beginning for him that morning. And whilst on the surface of things this might not seem so far out of place, for anyone who knew him prior to this shift - and what a completely miserable bastard he was - this was all a very dramatic change of climate. It has also never changed back, even 30 years on, as far as I know.

It is a dramatically better state of being, but somehow also effortless and free. It is not as if they are 'doing' anything in order to maintain this liberated experience. It is just washing over them constantly, and for free. Beyond that critical threshold, they are merely falling into it - endlessly, and effortlessly.

What this work essentially points to, then, is another entire world - one that is populated by another whole species in a sense. This is not a metaphor. I mean, there are those who are aware of all this, and those who are not, which is one thing. That path offers a degree of insight, and some empowerment. That directly earned awareness based power is what we might call 'Understanding' in this context, and that is a very real possibility, albeit much harder to acquire.

That (the 'Path of Understanding' etc) will be what I will be offering here now, for the few who will require such at first, and who define themselves as ready for that very demanding exploration. But that hard won and very direct transcendence is not the important distinction in this regard, not next to the difference between those who still have this massive and very dynamic disruptive event rampaging around in their inner lives, and those who do not. Because whilst Understanding may offer some degree of empowerment, it is only a sort of 'taming of the beast' at best - whereas that free state really does represent a completely different software package for the same machine, and will also become far more widely accessible here in due course.

We might call that far deeper and far simpler shift 'Empowered Realisation' (sorry I'm just making names up here!), and the important thing to know about this very dramatic potential is that it will not require all the very serious degrees of direct and penetrating personal self-awareness that is implied in gaining any degree of direct transcendence. Why bother taming this beast, when you can simply hire someone to come along and help you shoot the fucking thing?

Also, I will use the term 'gift' here instead of 'path' if only because Empowered Realisation is not something anyone will need to pursue - it is not a path anyone will need to travel. It will simply arrive at some point, washing over them like a tsunami. I mean, I am not on the 'path of jumbo jets' - intercontinental travel came to me, not the other way around.

To clarify, then -

- What we called the Path of Realisation above refers to people who have already made this 'transition' somehow, and thereby released themselves from the bind associated, who are then seeking to assist others in doing the same. But that doesn't actually work, and there is endless evidence for this. So this might more accurately be referred to as a 'non-path'.
- What we are calling the Path of Understanding here refers to a process of direct penetration and insight regarding the detailed core anatomy of the events in question - in strictly scientific terms, rather than any kind of spiritual mumbo jumbo - which in this case is a path that will only need to be travelled by a rare and dedicated few.
- What we are calling the Gift of Empowered Realisation refers to the directly accessible applications that will inevitably emerge as more and more brave people begin to travel the Path of Understanding together, and this possibility will be increasingly available to everyone over time.

But remember, we are not talking about everyone suddenly 'believing' something here, or 'supporting' something in any political sense. You will not get to vote for this, and popularity will mean nothing, not during the important early development stage. You are not being consulted here - only informed. You are merely being offered the opportunity to make your own small contribution here, if you wish. And if you don't choose to do that, others certainly will. So there is no political dimension, and no need for broad social support.

Social exposure prior to the deployment of any kind of sustainable and reliable application would probably be highly detrimental in this case. That's the last thing it needs; a whole bunch of mindless and highly enthusiastic 'believers' who imagine that all they need to do is foist this awareness on millions of innocent people who will only find it toxic and offensive, and who also have very little to offer it. How would that help? As with the rest of life - believers are generally the problem, not the solution. And this is what confuses many people, most especially due to the way their expectations have come to be so fully tuned to only that level of inane social hype these days.

What is being proposed is not merely some shallow or transient idea, or social movement, that might help you feel a little better about the fundamentally sorry state of your life. It is not a compensation, or a consolation, or a club to belong to. It is not a philosophy to adopt. Knowing it may be interesting, sure, but we all know enough people with a PhD to be pretty confident that just knowing stuff doesn't make you a better person, or even improve your life at all.

In contrast to all of that sort of empty viral 'following' - which is pretty much all we have come to expect these days - what is being pointed to here is a direct practical application; a real and substantial process of profound and penetrating personal change. Indeed, it will probably always be quite a painful or even tortuous process. But the outcome of that event, when coupled with how reliably accessible it might become over time, will nevertheless make it an overwhelming proposition. And it will be made all the more attractive given that you will not need to become aware of all the underlying mechanics associated, at least not beforehand. Afterwards you may be a lot more interested, but by that stage looking around will be a lot less threatening, and by then in no way necessary.

What will all of that look like in practice, then? How will it appear in the world? We could speculate, but I guess only time will tell. As indicated, the few people who find it seem to go through an almost unbearable period of personal anguish (the proverbial 'dark night of the soul' etc) just prior to the final release - a state of tension far beyond what most people would ever tolerate. Which is one reason why those extreme people can't generally duplicate that event in any normal person who asks.

This is the great challenge here: it is all about the average person overcoming this complex and dynamic emotional barrier, but this is also where having a detailed and dynamic map for this territory might change everything.

So what difference might a comprehensive grasp of the core anatomy make over time, assuming that at least a few people can understand it? Who knows! It might not ever get down to the level of 'take this pill and watch that screen', but the personal significance of the resulting outcome will still make it a force majeure.

I mean, if you ask anyone who has happened to find this free state whether or not they would rather lose it again, or have a limb amputated, they will invariably opt to lose the limb. Most would probably sacrifice all their limbs before they would let go of the bright inner light they have found. It is a very profound shift, far beyond the ability of words to convey in any meaningful sense. But the idea will not be to talk about it. The idea is that - with enough of the anatomy to be able to comprehensively predict all the associated variables - that state will become increasingly accessible as a direct personal experience. The idea is not only personal insight, it is individual empowerment through collective development.

There are two possible versions of you, that's what Realisation implies. Two stable equilibriums (2EQ) exist, not just one, as we generally tend to conclude. And this changes everything we assume about where we currently are, and also where we might go from here. It is truly devastating in its implications, most especially because it has been so comprehensively overlooked.

The transition between one state and the other will also become available extremely rapidly; it will be essentially unstoppable once it begins at a cultural level. But the event that explains all of that cannot easily be seen, even when you look.

Of course, and as I said above, a great many people have lived such narrow and cloistered lives that they are broadly unaware that such deep personal transformations even exist, but they certainly do, as anyone who has spent much time exploring this territory will surely attest. Some such processes are very profound, and yet only very temporary. Others are only rather trivial, but remain permanent in effect. And then there are a few that are both extremely profound, as well as completely permanent in effect - and the one we are speaking of here is the mother of all such processes, the secrets of which are finally about to be unlocked at last.

•

What has changed here, then? Has this bucket finally burst at last? Yes. That path now appears to be open in any case, at least within the rather unusual framework being explained below, and for anyone prepared to meet me halfway in that sense. So my task will be to take anyone who demonstrates a sufficient degree of aptitude to that point of minimum capture by the fastest and easiest possible route, assuming they are interested, and broadly ready for that. We have the blueprint here, at least in outline, for anyone who is prepared to look. But what we have sketched out here also explains some of the challenges that remain, the direction it all must move, and already some indication of the dangers associated.

All of which brings us to this present moment, and the possibility of taking a deeper look at all of it in some kind of safe and effective way. Certain things have suddenly become a lot clearer about how best to begin such exploration together now in contrast to the pattern it had been so deeply trapped in for so long.

In particular, I had to ask myself - what had occurred so freely as I sat down with my friend that morning? What was it, exactly, that shifted? I mean, we didn't even get into any of the details, and yet something very important had occurred.

So what can we learn from that, and how might it change things now that people might suddenly be able to hear something that has been left screaming in silence for decades?

Several things came together in that context, and each of them is probably important in its own way -

- The first thing we both immediately realised is that we probably need a place to meet in this regard.

And not only just for us, but a place where others could gather also, in order to share and explore all of this in a safe and effective way - and also to have all of that recorded in some form that might be of value to anyone who follows. And this is an option we have here at last, which is not something that has previously been available.

You will find a forum space devoted to such at 2EQ.org now. I will be answering questions there directly for as long as that remains realistically sustainable, or at least until others step in to take over that load. Necessarily, however, you will find that to be an extremely regulated space in the first instance. Which is fine for you of course, after all you shouldn't even be reading this unless you have been directly invited. But for anyone coming in cold, things will be very different.

Given the nature of the insight in this instance, and the extremely loaded cultural response associated, the website will basically need to be a fortress. The whole thing is still a strictly private affair at this fledgling stage, and the very intimate and penetrating nature of the territory also means that engaging with people directly in any way can be an 'interesting' experience at my end, to put it mildly.

The subject matter in this instance basically sets up a situation where merely beginning to openly explore this particular aspect of life can have dramatic and unpredictable effects on people, as they initially go for a bit of a tumble as they try to adjust to something that is ultimately very challenging.

Public dissemination of this information is simply not the purpose here, and probably never will be, so there would be no point to making anything openly available. The initial idea here is merely to test out and develop various ways of explaining all of this in a context where those resources will ultimately be used only to deliver understanding to just a few select people, not ever to broadcast information to the masses. At least that's how it looks at this stage. So casual visitors will see almost nothing, and even if they attempt to post anything that does not qualify as a valuable contribution it will never be seen by anyone - not before it is approved by independent moderators. The whole thing needs to be teflon for trolls etc.

It seems fair. It is a private party - and yet, if you walk in off the street, and ask nicely, you may be given access. But act like a dick, and you won't have much luck.

In any case, the online aspect - in all of its forms - does still represent an important function in relation to any kind of collective event, and so as the whole thing evolves it will gradually take on these various different functions.

Overall, the core insight here is so singular and profound that seeing it for the first time can be a pivotal moment, but also a strangely lonely experience, as you suddenly realise you now know something very important, but also something that cannot easily be shared in any normal sense. So having a place where you might meet others who have also begun to grasp the broader implications can be a very welcome relief. Without that possibility, along with all the other layers and levels that a fully fledged online resource might provide, no obvious pathway ahead can be seen.

I mean, my friend and I have not spoken about any of this since that day, and not only because we live a thousand miles apart, but almost certainly for this reason - it is because the whole thing has no point if it cannot freely move forward in any collective sense, even if it is true. So this communal space becomes crucial in the wake of the primary insight being gained.

However, grasping that core anatomy in the first place is another matter entirely, and that will generally require the added factors outlined in more detail immediately below.

- The second thing is that we went backwards, not forwards.

I always got this part totally wrong, as indicated above. The issue I was suffering from in this regard is sometimes called 'environment blindness' - when you live with something for so long that you no longer even see it. It just becomes part of the background of life, invisible to you in a sense.

In this context that means I had completely lost sight of the wider and simpler outlines here, and tended to always go forward instead, into all the details of this event (the most emotionally threatening and also intellectually complex) - without ever suspecting that people really had no idea about the most basic framework, or even what was broadly at stake.

I have always known the essential guts of what is revealed here - that there is a very serious problem in life, that the world is absolutely saturated in deep personal dishonesty, and also that there is another entire possibility available right where we stand - which is probably why I went looking for such with so much clarity and determination. And I'm sure there are others who have always had a similar fracture in the delusional armour common culture provides everyone with. But apparently this basic assumption is not something most people naturally leap to at all, so when I would say "I found it!", they would always just say "found what?"

I mean, there are more than a few challenges associated with exploring this particular territory, and without that elementary foundation it is fair to say that most people don't really understand why they would even bother. Even now you will probably not be grasping this part fully, not really.

It is basically a shock, an affront even, for something so dramatic to emerge out of nowhere and so completely upset the apple cart we all take for granted. And I do get this, but it also can't be avoided.

So what has to happen in the first instance is that we need to unpack the very simple kernel already outlined above, rather than go marching forward into all the explicit anatomy - and most especially to do this in a way that truly satisfies each individual person's every mental or emotional itch, until they really grasp it fully, at least in essence.

This is where shifting that conversation back to the most basic level seems to have such a dramatic effect, it is because doing so suddenly provides a big piece that I never even knew was missing. And with this deep shift at the very root of the conversation the whole thing suddenly takes on an entirely different momentum.

In a sense it is like taking the punchline of the entire joke and placing it right at the start, rather than at the end. It just doesn't seem right, and yet the effect is immediate and quite profound in this instance.

Perhaps this is what people mean when they separate deductive reasoning from inductive reasoning - one of them is a lot easier to follow. And once again this is probably where I got this part wrong.

I was taught to think by someone who always used the far more rigorous processes of deductive reasoning in order to formulate conclusions that were certain and unequivocal, assuming that all the precepts and facts associated stood up to scrutiny. And so that was always the basis of my writing. But in this instance, because the paradigm is so massive, what this meant was that the important conclusions were all placed far too deeply inside the territory, and that - without the impetus only those aspects might deliver - nobody ever made it that far. So those conclusions were always just left sitting there like giant unopened presents - like pots of gold at the end of a rainbow nobody ever ventured far enough to see.

But now what we see is the opposing style emerging - a style that is entirely unfamiliar to me. Instead of placing all of that cognitive demand in front of the big payoff, and asking people to do the work associated, what we now see is a process where all of that work is basically done for you - or at least with you - right up front, and only then do we begin the process of assessing whether or not the underlying assumptions can be logically or empirically justified. And even that part becomes optional in this context, if all you want to do is just take a quick look inside the pot and see if there is actually gold in there.

This is what it means for the missing key to have been located at the very shallow end, rather than in the deep. It means that the overall weight of implication associated can actually be calculated in purely abstract terms in a sense, but also in a way that has a surprising amount of direct relevance to any typical person's experience of life. It implies that you can now basically grasp what it all might mean for your own life, and also for the world, but without any detailed appreciation of the underlying events in question.

It is ironic that this very elementary part might even end up being the most significant aspect of all, in that it zooms in on what turned out to be the elusive missing piece.

You can essentially just point to 'something', in the same sense as you might say - if we place 'something' heavy on that end of the seesaw of life, what will happen at this end? And people can basically get it. They can also grasp the implications associated with any group of people getting together to take that heavy thing off the other end of the seesaw, and the sort of change that might result in, at this end - both for themselves, and for the world as a whole. And yet, even without all of that detail the sheer weight of implication still provides the impetus required in order to reach the first important milestone here. It is not about the 'what' at all, but all about the 'why'. It is about pure emotional and moral engagement, not intellectual insight.

- Finally, and the other thing that was probably a factor that day, was that I was speaking to someone in direct conversation.

This part apparently makes a big difference not only at your end, but also at mine. Just grasping the basic outlines here is a momentous shift for most people, and rarely occurs without at least a bit of very serious digesting, ideally in the context of open and rigorous dialogue.

In particular the ability to dynamically respond in real time to each individual person's various layers of loaded unconscious reaction appears to be critical. Every person is completely unique in this regard, which is what made writing about it almost impossible.

There are actually many things that the opportunity to simply sit down and chat about all of this allows for that no written form of discourse can ever offer, and this option to have the whole thing personally tailored is certainly one of those. But another thing direct chat facilitates is the 'snack sized' option.

In writing you can only seek to span the entire gamut of the emerging framework, and to somehow capture the whole thing with a single unbroken thread. You need the entire map in a sense. And you also need to achieve this much heavier task in a way that somehow fits all the various levels of audience associated, which in this case basically makes that prospect insuperable, especially if you don't have any clear grasp of how all those different types of people are currently thinking (which is something I lost track of years ago now).

But once you are speaking to someone directly, it becomes possible to break all of that up like little Lego blocks and examine each one on its own, and also to play with those blocks much more freely so as to explore how they might best be arranged.

We thereby also manage to bypass what was previously a very high demand on any potential audience, where someone might have been expected to encompass the entire event from end to end.

The emerging paradigm here has vast and sprawling implications in many areas of life. It is a massive picture in this sense, literally an entire operating worldview. It can easily become the main lens through which you view life in general, and for those few who will need to see all of that detail it will certainly max out their hard drive, so to speak.

But this is what changes here now. Fortunately, for most people, that will not be required now as we begin to explore it all a lot more casually.

In any case, direct conversation is a much lower bar to jump in terms of what it asks from any potential participant. Not to mention that it will only be this one small missing piece right at the beginning that we will be polishing up at first, again and again, as we go backwards to examine the overall scope, rather than forwards into all the details. The subject of such chat in the first instance will always be to merely explore what we have already laid out above, nothing more. As I say. Easy.

•

But what am I going to do - speak to people directly? Really? Yes, that's exactly what I am going to do now. At many different levels at once, most likely - both via chat on the forum, but maybe also in person, at least with a few people. And so this also needs to be explained here, because people rarely grasp this part correctly at first.

There are certain natural assumptions that turn out to be completely wrong in this instance, along with certain dangers, so we will probably always need to provide a bit of deeper context - and not only to point out the purpose of beginning this simple chat format at this point, but also to explain the potentially explosive outcomes associated. As the old saying goes - 'sometimes the only thing worse than failure might be success'.

The point is - most people only ever compute the implications of all this being false, and never consider the implications of it being true. They also only ever see the whole thing from their own vantage point, and never from mine. Which is only natural, but also incredibly tedious, not to mention how dangerous that might be in so many ways, and not only for me. This entire possibility is simply not what people think it is at first, and I believe you will come to see before too long that this is an extreme understatement. There is a great deal more to know, even about the prospect of this very casual shallow end chat. In the end that is far from being the insignificant event it might seem at first glance.

This is one part that will seem quite bizarre once you do get to fully grasp the scale and implications of the larger event here, and who that event is for in the first instance, especially if you gain such awareness in direct conversation - that we were just sitting there chatting away so casually about all of that. You won't really understand this until you see it all more fully. But this is not a joke.

We have said it many times here now, but you still won't really be getting it: Just how big all of this is - how deep, how significant. You will basically be embarrassed when you look back at how you began, and amazed at how we might have just been so blithely sitting around discussing something that was actually so vast and deep and dramatic - and also that in doing so we might have actually been having a very real impact on that. It will seem absurd, and it is absurd. But it is what it is.

This also means that you might easily come back to me at some later stage and ask me why I didn't warn you right at the start that it was so massive, and that it might even derail your entire life. So if ever that happens, I am just going to bring you back here and say that I did actually warn you, and also very clearly.

I mean, the whole possibility of simply chatting away about this stuff probably seems a little mundane or pedestrian? What's the big deal, I hear you ask? People talk about all sorts of things, all the time. Especially authors with their friends - they rant away incessantly about whatever they are passionate about. And we are not even discussing the possibility of doing anything public in this instance, just ordinary private conversation about a very particular topic. Surely that's a walk in the park, as they say? But no, not in this instance. This is different, and you would see that immediately if you tried it.

The key in this regard is to have a description robust enough, and comprehensive enough, to capture all of its potential forms and movements, and in doing so gain a kind of existential Kung Fu. And that's what we see emerging here for the first time. The deeper anatomy of this paradigm is a king hit. It catches that unconscious tiger by the tail, so to speak. And let's just say that the unconscious, which is spending so much time and energy trying to avoid that very thing ever making its way into the plain light of day, really doesn't like that possibility much. It can elicit a surprising amount of immediate hostility, even from people who initially say they are interested to know. And this is why there needs to be a clear boundary, and why people need an opportunity to consent.

•

So a question I always confront at this point is whether to say anything more about the journey ahead. After all, you are only being invited to go backwards here, not forwards - and also only in a very casual and intimate context, where the entire thing can now be broken up into little bite sized chunks, and where even then it will only be a single very simple piece we will be looking at in the first instance.

It is because of this apparent bind that I actually got stuck here when I was writing this down - I kept adding all of the necessary warning and preparation associated with moving forward into some sort of meaningful exploration of this subject matter together, only to then realise that none of that heavy scaffolding would have made any sense at all unless the scope and nature of what is being suggested had already been carried over first. So we kept ending up with a chicken or the egg situation.

It just kept happening, again and again. I kept piling up all the things you might need in your backpack for the broader journey associated. But it was only when I realised that I had conflated a few quite different processes of exploration that it all began to settle back into place again.

Actually, there are quite a few different paths emerging here, an entire landscape of possibilities in a sense, and each of them will come with its own dangers and demands. You can explore it with me, or with others, or on your own. You can take a casual look at it, or a far deeper examination, or even become involved in developing it in practice. Or any combination you might desire, including none of the above, of course - that will be the most common of all, and not at all to be discouraged.

This is one aspect I had never really considered before, after all the whole prospect of this territory opening up is somewhat new to me. So I find myself trying to separate all of these various streams here now, and to somehow make sense of it all in a way that will allow each to stand up straight in its own right.

For instance I really had no idea that any kind of online forum space might need to be broken up into so many different sections, or that so much of it might need to remain private. That's not exactly the open and natural situation I was aiming for, but the whole thing is simply being governed by necessity at this early stage, in light of the unfortunate social realities associated.

Anyway, what I eventually realised about any 'broader cultural exploration' is that all the necessary information required can simply be included along the way, as an essential part of whatever resources emerge here over time. There really is a lot to know in that sense, but there is a lot to know in general, and in many cases merely having a deeper understanding of the situation will itself make the explicit explanation of such boundaries unnecessary. You will simply pick that up along the way, if you choose to take such a journey on your own steam.

But once again, that's not what we are discussing here, because that's not where we currently stand. That independent path is not currently open in any meaningful sense, which is sort of the point. Those resources are not yet available in any finished or refined form, that will be one of the primary aims of any ongoing dialogue. Many books have been written, but we are now going to need to make sure they make sense to people before they are published, in light of this initial kernel of insight being provided for them first, right at the start.

This is what we mean about the power of merely talking about all of this, and where not talking about it has left us. Without these resources being available, no conversation about all of this can even be started, let alone any insights gained being preserved or recorded in any way. No incremental development can occur over time, which is precisely where we have been stuck for centuries.

This is how the collective supports the stable maintenance of this repression in the individual, and thereby assists people in avoiding emotional crisis. Which is admirable if the events being denied had no possible resolution, but in this instance it actually does. So the simple act of creating a space where you might openly discuss such things is more significant than you might at first grasp, but also a lot more socially prohibited than you might expect. The whole thing is very deeply divergent, both psychologically and culturally speaking, and in ways that are not immediately obvious at first. It is all because the event we have been defining really is there.

Therefore, just crossing that very simple line - and entering a context where you are not only allowed to talk about this particular subject matter, but where you also have a detailed blueprint available for all the previously hidden anatomy - is not the trivial event that it may seem at first. And this is especially true now that we have cornered this very simple end of the spectrum, where you might have the opportunity to have that personally fitted, so to speak, and to have all of that tailored to your own current understanding of things.

I'm sure it all sounds rather intense, but really it's not like that at all - not in the shallow end. And there is really no onus to go any further than that. In this sense I suppose the main thing will be to keep all of these various processes isolated from each other in some sense, and to always know which one we are engaging in, so as to remain clear about the boundaries and demands in each case, along with the particular function of each. In some ways this might even be the main purpose of what we are doing here, as we seek to make way for this very simple chat. There are also many other important things to know about the broader territory associated, and how to navigate it all safely, whilst still making headway in that regard. But most of that will not relate to you.

In the end I don't actually need to prepare you to go forward at this stage, because that is not what you are being invited to. The only thing you are being invited to at this point is a far more elementary snapshot of the whole thing. Just a quick tour of the factory, not on-the-job training. Literally just an hour or two, maybe three, at most. Really, just reading this invitation will probably take you longer than the event it is preparing you for, so it is all a bit strange.

The point, however, is that you won't just stay there once we do chat. This is precisely what this new opening means. The whole thrust of that one small backwards part - the aspect I never noticed before - is a bit like pulling a slingshot back. What happens when you then release it?

It will move you. That's what I'm saying. It must. Assuming for a moment that you are human, and not a rock. So if it doesn't move you, then you probably haven't seen it yet. Because it really is an insight that stands to change everything, for everyone, with unstoppable force, and in a way that cannot be undone. It is literally a permanent solution to an enormous amount of human suffering, and it will only take a few people to initiate that process, which makes it the most beautiful thing ever for anyone living a truly moral life. Those people might be rare, I understand that. But I have to believe that where there is one, there might be more.

Anyway, I suppose the brief and singular chat being proposed is just a 'tasting plate' in this sense, not a meal, and as such it may actually leave you even more hungry than when you began. So even though there are no ethical hooks at this level, or in this format - which means that you are totally free to simply take a look without any possibility of being lumbered with any further onus - your own humanity might nevertheless force your hand in that regard.

And yes, I know that sounds a bit silly, but this is my point here. At this stage the whole thing is just sort of bouncing off you. You almost certainly aren't really getting it yet. All of which might leave you blind to what comes next in the wake of grasping all of this more fully, and especially how to grapple with the possibility that it could all be quite real.

It all asks some very big questions in this sense, and also produces an incredible degree of moral impetus along the way. And that's what moves you. It really is very difficult to just sit there and do nothing when you see such a dramatic potential being placed within easy reach of just a dedicated few, and especially when finding and empowering those few appears to already be resting within the power of pretty much anyone. And the combined ethical weight of these two things together tend to produce a kind of bending of space morally and intellectually speaking, where the questions tend to simply be blindly dismissed in order to back away from the ethical implications.

Everybody wants to change the world, but not everyone wants to step into that breach themselves. I know this for certain because that's exactly what this event provides for - and you should see people run like hell once they realise this!

And will you be any different? Probably not. That really would make you very unusual. But that's why we have generated this shallow end of the pool here. It is all so that you can jump in and only go as far as you feel comfortable. There is no onus to do anything more than that, and whatever feedback you do offer will always be valuable.

Therefore, generating this 'shallow end' could turn out to be a kind of summary key that opens up an entire field of possibility, but it also seems inevitable that the very same beginner's end of this pool will only ever be a temporary event, and that before long the entire conversation will gradually migrate back into deeper waters. The whole point of me walking down this stairway to meet you at the bottom, in this sense, is that those stairs only go in one direction from that point - upwards. And once again we strike the same issue - what then?

Put simply -

Does that very basic capture immediately shunt people quite dramatically in the direction of further exploration and insight?

Yes.

But does it also open the way for that deeper development to occur together?

No.

This is one of many apparent paradoxes this shift has produced. In this case that sort of collective exploration is not nearly as simple as it might seem. Just saying 'let's go!' doesn't actually address the issues of 'go where?', or 'go how?', or 'with whom?' etc. And it also leads immediately into territory where you might be increasingly confronted with details that could be deeply threatening to your very carefully balanced equilibrium. Which, in relation to typical culture, and for anyone unprepared, places the prospect of any kind of open exploration at the extreme negative end of the spectrum.

What does all of that mean? It means that we have only prepared you to go backwards here at this point, not forwards. And also that we have only opened the way for a guided tour in that sense, not free exploration on your own. Which would all be fine if you were going to stay within those boundaries, but you probably won't.

Even now you will be thinking that I am going on unnecessarily here, but that's not true at all. This is what I mean about it being a 'chicken or the egg' situation. This perception is only the result of not yet having been able to chat about what was already outlined above. But if we have done that already then nothing here will seem at all out of place. Indeed, if we have done that then this might barely seem adequate.

Overall, then, it is as if we were previously (in writing) trying to get people to run the whole race, in which context they always struggled to even take that first step. But now that we are (in person) only asking them to take a single step (and even then only backwards at first), it is as if we suddenly can't stop them from wanting to run the whole race. And yet, this sudden interest does not mean they are necessarily prepared for such a path in its full scope and depth.

It all brings into view one of the primary aims of this entire work, and what makes it different to much of what we see these days - direct individual empowerment.

There is an old adage -

"Give a man a fish, and he will eat for a day - teach a man to fish, and he will eat for a lifetime."

This is my dilemma here, then. In any direct dialogue I will essentially just be giving you a fish. Or perhaps even a few different fish. That's what makes it easy, and fun. There can definitely be beer involved. We will also only be poking around in the very shallow end in that regard, at first anyway. But there remains a kind of dependency in that context, where I will be doing most of the navigation, and that means it won't ever be very sustainable. I won't be able to do this with many people at the same time, or for very long, if only because that process will very quickly migrate into a far deeper forward moving journey together with those few who end up interested in such.

So at first I will merely do it for you here, as I say - in person, and also in the forum space - where many of the important boundaries and limitations will be built into the context itself. But in the end you really need to know the significance of such dialogue, as well as the risks, in particular so as to be able to generate that sort of exploratory event wherever - and whenever - you wish.

There are no leaders here, and there is no political dimension whatsoever. As indicated. This snake has no head. So there is no single place where this particular conversation will be occurring, not once it becomes established more broadly. And nobody will be in charge of it - any more than anyone is in charge of 'physics'.

I mean, does physics have leaders? Can you 'follow' physics? No. There is no facebook page for that. You can't vote for physics, or even donate to it. You can't opt in, or opt out. You can only choose to understand it, or not. That's all. Physics is simply a foundational aspect of our existence, like it or not, and as such belongs to all of us equally.

In many ways this is exactly like that. All we are doing here is opening a gate. What is being described is either true, or it isn't. And if it is actually true, then there is nothing you can do about that except face it, or deny it. But either way it will remain true, just like physics. And all we are doing here is seeking to provide a path by which that essential understanding might be gained, and to thereby place such power directly into the hands of the individual.

Therefore, the very last thing we ever want to happen here is to generate any sort of dependency, or hierarchy, or parasitic obfuscation that leads only to some kind of frustrated and subservient 'following'. We need to somehow not only make way for this very simple and singular chat right here at the start, but more importantly to make sure we don't neglect all the rest of the territory associated, or those who will travel such.

So if we ever want to get really serious here we probably need to take the time to map this territory out a bit more in due course, and not only to explain how we will be doing it all within any forum space etc, but more especially to enable you to do it all for yourself. We all need to make sure we understand the rules, the challenges, what's at stake, and what the real game is here.

The key thing to clarify in this regard is that we are really only aiming at a very particular person ultimately, but also that the way all of this has worked out now there ends up being great value in explaining just the broadest outlines right at the start - and that this can be done with pretty much anyone. We have basically found a way to enable those who don't qualify at the highest levels to assist those who do, and to maybe even have fun along the way. You might never need to know all the complex details in this sense, that's sort of the power of this new possibility we are opening up here.

So why are you even seeing this at all, then, if you are almost certainly not one of those rare few?

First of all, you could indeed be one of them. That's not for me to say, or for anyone else to judge. If you can lift, you can lift. So that will be for you to define. But even if you are not, it really doesn't matter so much now that we see a shallow end of this pool emerging here, and the opportunity that offers to anyone who might be interested in merely taking a look.

This is what dialogue means - it provides a chance to achieve this forward moving penetration of the critical anatomy indicated, but without all of the associated risks or demands. So it's like having a passenger seat in an F1 car now - you get to take a ride, and get the thrill, but without even necessarily needing to know how to drive. You get this one first lap for free, just to give you a taste of what it's like.

•

I suppose the main thing at first is to not confuse the low with the high, or to confuse the calm I might project with the very extreme levels of tension being experienced as we take this final step and make this information available in such a personal way.

In the end it is simply not typically understood by most people that the sort of state I have ended up in here even exists, let alone what might drive such epic forces. Their entire lives are devoted to nothing more significant than merely trying to enjoy themselves, and acquiring stuff, or otherwise just taking the easiest path possible. They have no concept whatsoever about what it might be like to be completely eclipsed by such a thundering moral force, or to have your entire life hijacked by a task that was never chosen, and which was therefore never calculated to actually fit within the boundaries of any normal person's limitations.

For me it is as if I have been swimming underwater for decades now, all on a single breath, and that this threshold is like a waterline that I need to get my head above at last. And maybe that story will need to be told at some point, just to make sense of the origins of all this, and the path associated. But for now the only thing you need to know is that it is all about making sure this threshold is reached at every point, no matter what level we are talking about. And, most importantly, it is about excluding anything that does not qualify in this regard, at every progressive stage.

But here we also see the gift that this shallow end offers us - the whole point is that it is a lot more forgiving than the more rigorous deep end. And I will probably be doing this shallow bit again and again for a while, at least until that whole missing section at the start becomes consolidated and recorded in some way. But we always need to remain aware of the wider context here, and what all of that ultimately relates to. We should never imagine that what is going on in the shallow end is the same as what will be going on in the deep - or to imagine that each will be open to the same people.

In a very real sense, then, we see an extremely high bar being set here - one that very few will ever hope to jump. And yet, we also see how pretty much anyone might in some sense step across this important threshold now. After all, we have been paving the way for this shallow end event here, and thereby lowering this threshold somewhat. Which is true, it really does come down, literally as far as we want in a sense, provided I have the time and energy to break it down to that level. So it seems a bit confusing. Is it quite easy, or very demanding? It all depends who you are, and at which level you wish to engage it.

Perhaps think of a rocket going into space - the tiny bit at the top (the part that actually makes it into space) is not the part that provides all the thrust. All that lift is delivered by much simpler, heavier, and more powerful boosters that are jettisoned at several stages along the way, thereby propelling that crucial payload higher and higher, and ultimately toward escape velocity - at which point it can achieve stable orbit or freedom from the earth's gravity well.

That payload here is the few who are truly ready for such an adventure, when coupled with the information required - and the heavy boosters are all the rest of us, who are charged with finding those few, empowering them, and also informing them accordingly.

In any case - like the rocket - there is no point to any of it if that critical payload does not make it into orbit, so to speak, and thereby escape the entrapment implied. There are only two possible final outcomes in this sense (two stable equilibriums - 2EQ), and they are completely different.

This elementary distinction between outcome states can be difficult to see at any moment, especially if you do not grasp the deeper context within which any particular action is occurring, and this is where a bit of guidance can help.

Put simply - if you are not doing the new one, then you are doing the old one (its opposite) by default. There is no neutral ground here, and this is what many people find very disturbing. If you are not for it, then you are against it - this is simply built into the anatomy of the particular situation we find ourselves in.

That final cascading release will only ever occur in the wake of a kind of spiralling development. And so, if whatever you are engaged in right now is not part of an overall event that includes all of those levels, and is also set up so as to sustainably surpass this minimum threshold at every one of those stages, then what you are engaged in is not actually part of this emerging culture at all. Sorry. That's just the old culture masquerading as the new one, which is the ultimate enemy in this context, not any kind of friend. We have seen that before here, and it must never happen again.

This is the exact mark we will be seeking to cross now, in such an unequivocal manner. That's precisely why I'm stepping in at this point - it is not only so as to ensure that at least something happens on the right side of this line here, but more importantly to make very sure that nothing at all ever happens on the wrong side of it.

What does that mean? It means that you are presently immersed in a culture that is sweeping this particular body of awareness away in a very active and pervasive manner, and that you don't even realise this. But what it also means is that what you see emerging here is the antidote to that blindness, for anyone who wants to know what is being avoided so ferociously. It means that - if I am present - then your awareness of this stuff will certainly increase, moment by moment, and as part of a wider framework that will inevitably begin to get stronger and stronger. This much I can promise you. So don't ask the question if you don't want to know the answer. This is the only place on the planet that you will currently find this particular information.

This not only explains the important threshold we need to always reach here in some sort of resounding way, but also the part that anyone might play in the very early stages. It explains how this rather playful and easy shallow end works in relation to the far more serious deep end. And it also explains the purpose of all of it - which will be to reach a point where this 'assisted exploration' option is no longer required at all.

Developing the resources necessary to be able to generate this cultural dynamic for yourself will be the entire point of what we will be doing, along with more selectively targeting a very particular type of audience over time.

The important thing to know is that if you fail to do any of this in a way that satisfies the minimum requirements associated, at any of the necessary stages along the way, then not only will it not work, or be sustainable, but you will actually cause more harm than good.

Like getting on a horse, or floating a boat, or jumping a crevasse - there is no middle ground in this sense. It is all defined by the outcome achieved. So you either do it, or you don't do it. Half doing it just isn't worth anything at all.

There is no 'nice try' in this instance, no 'good effort', no 'certificate of participation'. And that is why this critical minimum level, this outcome orientation, is very important to guard so ferociously at every progressive stage.

This part is really very simple: in any situation you might find yourself - be that a book you are reading, or a conversation you are having - you will either be lifting this particular core insight up, or pushing this particular core insight down. There is no middle ground in this sense. Lifting it up temporarily, only to drop it again, is also completely worthless in this sort of context. That would be like lighting a fire, only to then watch it go out again. What would be the point?

This is the point I suppose - because the general force of inertia (both within ourselves and in cultural terms) is currently pulling us very powerfully backwards (in the direction of concealment and avoidance), it means that even reaching the point where you are standing still requires considerable energy at first. So just saying "let's talk about this" is not actually enough in this case. That is basically the equivalent of an aeroplane being cleared for takeoff at an airport. That alone does not explain the most important thing of all to the pilot in question - which is that there is always a minimum speed associated with actually taking off, and that if you are not going to at least reach the level of thrust required to overcome the weight you are carrying then you are certainly better off to avoid the whole idea. All you will get in that instance is just a massive fireball at the end of the runway. Total carnage.

This is exactly the sort of half-baked response we have been confronting previously in this instance, so there would be no point in any of this if all we were going to see was more of the same. That is worth nothing at all. Indeed, that is actually worse than nothing, as indicated. So we really do need to focus very keenly here on making sure we reach and surpass the only threshold that matters in this instance, and to always stay on that side of the line at every stage once that minimum level is attained.

It is all about the sort of situation we find ourselves in here, in cultural terms, with the gravity in our rocket metaphor being the general pull of collective inertia and avoidance, when coupled with the very powerful unconscious aversion in the individual. The entire context of life is very strongly pulling us away from the one thing we really need to see, and we don't even realise it.

Therefore, this remains the singular key at my own end of all this now - to eliminate anything that is not worthy of a response. And this is also what allows for all of it to be sustainable at my end. What was previously so incredibly dark in the face of an absolute sea of passive ignorance now becomes almost unbearably bright as even just a few find the courage to actually look, and to listen. And those are the people I must act to protect, in particular by progressively excluding all other noise.

You won't notice this for the most part, but my increasingly sunny disposition now will only ever exist due to very fierce and rigorous isolation from the surrounding cultural event. So I'm a smiling butcher now, singing away happily. But you really need to make sure you come in the front door here, and act politely, because if you come in the back door and act like an animal, then you probably won't like the outcome. There is an entire world where that backwards ethic can be expressed quite freely, so if that's what you want, then you know where to go. Attempting that here would probably be unwise.

Basically, at any level below that forward moving threshold things will degenerate very rapidly - so that will need to simply be avoided now.

Maintaining the inversion of this cultural effect is not at all difficult for me, but it does require a certain clinical detachment. Some of the nicest people I know would have no chance whatsoever of rising to this very simple threshold, and it can be very tempting to take a softly softly approach to that. But if you knew the history here you would realise that we have now exhausted that option, and spending time and energy on those who aren't ready only steals energy from those who are.

It is all simply about the journey the whole thing implies - about asking the next obvious question, and about doing the next obvious thing. And we should not be wasting energy on people who can't manage this when there are those present who can, and who therefore deserve such attention.

•

In some sense the very definition of this initial capture for people is itself defined by the sequence of events just described, and in grasping how all of that fits together. And strangely you already have all the information you might require for that, even in the outlines above. This is always what people are so surprised about when they do finally get it - how nothing much new is added, but that all they needed was to line the information up in a certain way, and to calculate the obvious implications.

It all starts off with the fundamental premise that this added event exists, and that it can - under certain circumstances - be permanently undone. This is the bedrock. But when you add to that the fact of just how easy making that possibility available to people, and that the only reason that didn't happen centuries ago is just because we didn't even know it was there, then things get a bit more interesting. Because in that case the entire prospect immediately extends downstream in terms of the way it points to a broad cascading collapse of this event at a global societal level - which is clearly a lot to take in. For most people this is itself rather difficult to fully comprehend. But then you turn around and examine the upstream aspect, where the entire thing might only need to be clearly enough pointed out by anyone in order to kick that entire event off, and suddenly you have this spiralling chain of events - a sequence that starts off with merely getting a few people together to capture a summary snapshot of the core anatomy associated, and that ends with an epic process of civilization level change.

Clearly there are a few intermediate steps and stages associated, but the overall trajectory - and the obvious milestones associated - become very plain from the first moment the individual potential is essentially understood.

As already indicated above, one of the central tenets of that basic framework is that it will only take a small and dedicated few to open all of this up in practice for everyone else, and that the average person won't need to know anything about all of the detailed underlying anatomy in order to access the applications associated. And now we also see the same thing occurring at the start, where there is very little cost, and a rather playful approach. But unlike the downstream masses, this does not mean ignorance can be maintained, since awareness is the very thing we will be fighting for in that context.

Which is to say, you might not need to travel into the deep from there, but you will need to understand the implications of someone doing that, and the demands associated. Seeing that entire chain of events is essentially what it means to graduate in that context. That will be the very purpose of chat.

So what does that deliver to you? What changes once you do see the whole picture in this sense?

Most obviously it is a moral shift. It is a deep understanding of the ultimate futility of all options that do not penetrate deeply enough to overthrow the core of the trap we are caught in at the individual level, when juxtaposed against the implications of achieving the ignition of that singular cascading outcome.

In simple terms it comes to be seen - and rightly so - as the answer to everything.

This is the shift. It is all defined by a series of interconnected facts, a chain of events that together produce a sort of ethical and practical algorithm. It is a worldview that is first of all rooted in a very particular view of how the individual person basically works, but more importantly that is defined by an absolutely overwhelming moral imperative. The moment the implications of that great cascading event come into view, along with just how accessible that might be, all other plans and schemes go out the window.

Suddenly there is only one very bright star remaining in the sky. And normally this would mean a very significant disruption of any person's moral landscape, but in this case we see a sort of 'get out of jail free' card being offered. That's what participating in this early dialogue means. It means you get a sneak peak, without any further demands associated.

•

Therefore, in one sense the important thing is to notice that those who have what it takes to travel fully upstream toward the ignition of this epic cascading event will be a completely different type of person to all those who will be dramatically affected in a downstream sense. The whole thing is most definitely not for everyone, not in the first instance, as indicated. Not in the deep end, which is the only part that matters ultimately. But in another sense we also see a dramatic opening emerging, at least temporarily. We have somehow ended up being able to chat away quite casually about things that are really part of a much more serious conversation that needs to occur here in due course.

This vast spectrum of different capacities and interests in the individual, as well as the varying access to direct conversation, is why we have taken the time to explain a little about the ultimate destination, even though you may not decide to go that far yourself. It is because - even if you don't go all that way, or decide to generate this level of cultural dialogue for yourself - there are others who certainly will, and in the end those few will be the ones who crack the entire thing open for everyone else.

This is also why we needed to do a bit of a war dance here right at the beginning - it is a bit like being on a lifeboat, and knowing that at least a couple of people are probably going overboard at some stage, which means that everyone needs to put on a lifejacket just in case. Sorry about that.

We need to take a balanced approach here. Given the scope and nature of what is being explored, we will always need to accept that many people will take a look and then run like hell the moment the full picture suddenly comes into view. And that's totally fine, as I say. Even that much will still be valuable now, in that they will only crap themselves so fully in this manner if they first of all grasp it momentarily, so this will at least tell us that we have succeeded in overcoming the core blindness associated. This is how that shallow end works now - even broader failure will be a kind of narrow success.

But we also need to account for the fact that at least some will respond in a more curious and courageous manner once they see it in outline, and perhaps even want to know what they might do to assist - or at the very least want to know more. Not everyone will slink back into the ethical bushes with their philosophical tail between their legs. And so, for those more 'morally and intellectually intact' people we need to not only open the way for this brief backward step, but also map out at least a little of what you might need to know if you wanted to then start going forwards instead.

Therefore, this is what it means for us to be adopting this new approach here - what was previously 'hard by the yard' now becomes 'a cinch by the inch' etc. The whole thing becomes slower in one sense, and also far more muscular as a communal event, but only if I am prepared to take the time to address each of those bits in direct conversation.

•

This is the issue that became so clear to me that morning - the big gap I had never really noticed before. The forces associated are apparently beyond what most people can easily calculate, and the scale and significance of the event are likewise just too much to take in at first. It's just too big, which is what generates the strange disconnect - it is like inviting someone home to meet your pet, which in this case happens to be an elephant, as I say. There is always the question about how much warning to offer.

How much should you explain beforehand? Or should you just say nothing? But the latter just doesn't seem fair, especially not in a context where merely becoming aware of all this has completely destroyed your own life, and not only once.

But it's not just that forewarning aspect, it is more about how to adjust the person's expectations up front, so as to expand their mind somewhat, and open them to what they are about to encounter. Without that prior setup they will often just sit there sipping their cup of tea, with their backs resting against the elephant, and say - so where is this elephant you keep talking about?

This is why I am making a big noise here - it is all just to see if we can expand your view somewhat.

That's why we need to chat - it is just so that I can help you grab hold of it once and for all, and thereby allow you to begin to see it, at which point another whole path and possibility suddenly opens up. We really do need to push that plug in that final inch, and in doing so suddenly light the entire thing up like a christmas tree for you. But without that very direct and forceful intervention right at the root of the inquiry, all we would get is a sort of existential anaphylaxis, where the whole question merely bounces off people's loaded emotional armour.

Really, this is the moment. Right here. This is as far as we can go, and as much as we can say. Indeed, even now there will be more than a few things that simply don't make much sense to you. So we are now standing at a sort of precipice in that regard. At this point we see an absolutely critical juncture, a fork in the road that - if not taken - will result in everything else that follows being pretty much worthless. It will all fall into space in that case, and nothing further will land as intended. And this is because a critical gap remains at this stage.

I have been saying repeatedly above that you will not yet have fully 'grasped' what I am saying, but that is perhaps not an entirely accurate description of the issue at hand. When I say this you will probably be interpreting that in the wrong sense.

You likely imagine I am saying - even though you may well have already been able to broadly calculate the implications of the basic claim at a cognitive level - that somehow all of that is still being held in a kind of 'sceptical quarantine' in a sense. But what I am not referring to is the possibility that you have not yet really taken it to heart, so to speak. Or that you have not yet opened yourself to the prospect that it might actually be the true situation we find ourselves in, nor allowed yourself to truly calculate what that might mean in real practical terms - even though all of those things are probably true also.

That's not what I mean. This doubt would not only be healthy, and normal, but in this instance absolutely vital. Actually, this 'unbelievable' aspect might even get worse once you really do grasp the proposition being explained. So if you aren't doubting any of this already, then you probably don't qualify for it, even in the shallow end.

The real issue is more likely that you have not yet seen it, even in broad terms. Not really. And this is where even a single direct conversation can help - it is all about striking that flint hard enough, at just the right angle, in order to get the whole thing started. You really need to very clearly understand where it is presently stuck, what getting it unstuck is going to require, and just how significant the results of doing that might be.

Truly, the first person I showed this invite to honestly thought he had grasped what I was saying by the time he had reached the end of it. So we sat down to have this brief chat about it, just to see how he might explain it all back to me in his own words. But I had to stop him very early on in order to release the obvious tension that task was generating.

Then I simply laid it all out, block by block, making sure each simple part was landing correctly, and lining them up in the right order. Strangely, none of the elementary blocks in question were particularly new to him, and this is the weirdest thing - it is all built from stuff we pretty much already assume.

Anyway, by the time we had finished this brief chat he had to admit that he really hadn't seen it at all. Not even slightly. He was also pretty shaken by it, to the point where he needed to take a couple of days off work, just to let it all sink in.

In the future, therefore, this brief chat will inevitably be replaced with some sort of summary roundup as that section of the territory begins to take shape and a clearer pathway emerges. And that might not even take very long, for all we know this initial invite document may only be used a couple of times before it is abandoned in favour of something much better. That is sort of the point after all.

In the meantime, we are stuck with the task of getting our boots on and simply crashing into that untamed bush here, just to see what we can put together in that context. And also to keep doing that, again and again, until at least some unity of vision can be established.

Therefore, and assuming that you are curious enough, we need to talk. And I mean actually talk, to mull all of this over - or at least do so via chat on the forum. We need to take a pause and let all of this settle, and also to assist it in doing so, by allowing you to check and balance the whole thing as this massive obelisk gradually comes to rest right in the middle of your own philosophical landscape. We need to walk around it, poke it, and prod it, and just generally try to tip it over. You need to be able to answer the very obvious questions it asks, and for that I am going to need to ask you a few questions in turn.

It will also only be at that stage when you will be able to begin meaningfully talking about any of this with others on the forum etc, or exploring any other material in more depth and detail. In that sense, there is a whole new world to discover, that's not even a metaphor. But first, you'll need someone to accompany you into that great dark warehouse and help you turn on the lights. After that, everything should become increasingly clear for you over time, all on its own.

In any case it is kind of humorous in its surprising obviousness when you are sketching it out in such simplistic terms. That part is always fun, like children lighting fireworks. It is always fascinating to see how it all lands as people suddenly or gradually come to grasp what is really being proposed, and in terms that truly fit their own current worldview. It is easy, casual, and pretty much effortless at that simple broader level - especially in person. Which is exactly what dialogue allows for.

However, and just to be clear, this very broadly focused initial discussion won't at all address whether or not it is basically true. That question belongs to a much more serious and forward-moving path, and even to ask that question would require a comprehensive grasp of the whole thing. You really can't even begin to have that conversation until you have first captured the entire thing in at least its most basic core anatomy, and that task will only be achieved once we all climb high enough to get above the clouds here, so to speak. Which will itself only ever occur on the basis of at least some commitment at your end, in terms of your desire to get to the bottom of it.

So it is only then that the true conversation will begin. Is it true? That is the right question. But first of all you need to answer the more fundamental question - what is it? Which means that the only question at this stage is simply whether you can see it, which is a completely different issue.

To be clear, however, getting above the clouds in this sense of truly capturing the whole thing in detailed enough resolution to be able to assess its veracity etc will not be the aim of this initial chat. That is a more significant climb. The whole point of the shallow end we have been laying out here is to enable a space where you might gradually decide this very point. Not whether it is true - but simply whether you want to take a serious look. That is the only task at first. Not even to do anything, but just to see it, at first merely in outline. Only then will you be able to think about the option of exploring it in deep enough terms that deliver power over it, in a real and practical sense.

It definitely won't make sense in certain regards, not in this very simplistic form, and how could it? The whole thing is just so epic in scale and depth. The questions it raises are deep, and important, and should not be avoided. But these deeper considerations belong to a different conversation entirely, one that will only happen later, if you choose to go that far.

The whole purpose of this first brief chat is to lighten that sort of intellectual load. Eliminating all of that weight will be what this initial toe in the water is all about. We won't be diving into all the deeper philosophical aspects just yet. The goal at this stage is just to provide a very simple outline in purely practical terms.

So this brief snapshot will only be a castle in the sky at this point, in that sense. Most of the necessary logical and empirical foundations will be missing in the beginning. That's what adopting an inductive reasoning style means. But at least you'll see what's at stake without much effort, and without any further obligation, and that should be interesting enough, especially if there's no pressure to go deeper than that.

And yes, I know, it will seem like I am going on and on here. This is always the perception at first, until the scale of the event comes into view. It is a huge deal. But it is not some kind of scheme, and you are not being recruited here. There is nothing it demands from you. Quite the opposite. You are almost certainly not the target audience. Very few will qualify at that level.

It is merely an opportunity to take a peek, that's all, and entirely for free, just to see if you do actually see it. Because just that much - just for you to see it, in a way that I can check just to make sure - assists me in building a narrative that might better assist those at the next level up.

Of course, if you want to go to that next level yourself, then that's fine, but there is no onus here. It is a free tour. There are no hooks, and no hidden costs. It is all just to make sure it is working now - and, if nothing else, just for the sheer joy of watching people's faces as they do finally grasp what is being explained. And yes, I'm sure you imagine you already see it based on what has been outlined above, but I definitely wouldn't be making the offer if that was true. No - it never arrives assembled, not really, not at first. So there is still a very big surprise in store for you here, if you like that sort of thing.

So please, if you know me, then get in touch. We can set a bit of time aside to chew the fat here, and to kick this giant ball around a little. In that context we can easily make sure that what we see above is correctly unpacked, and there is already a lot more there than you realise. Only then will you be able to assess for yourself whether or not you want to know more, what the purpose of knowing more might be in your own case, and whether you are actually ready for that, given how much is at stake.